Mr. WATERMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12203) to authorize the designation and bonding of persons to act for disbursing officers and others charged with the disbursement of public money of the United States, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1646) thereon.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the deficiency appropriation bill, which I ask may be printed, printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

That section 7 of the Public Act No. 391, Seventieth Congress, approved May 15, 1928, be amended by adding thereto the following proviso:

"Provided, That of said sum $1,200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be allotted by the Secretary of War on the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers in the reimbursement of levee districts or others for expenditures for the construction, repair, or maintenance of any flood-control work on any tributaries of the Mississippi River that may be threatened, impaired, or destroyed by flood or that have been impaired, damaged, or destroyed by flood; and also in the construction, repair, or maintenance, and in the reimbursement of levee districts or others for the construction, repair, or maintenance of any flood-control work on any of the tributaries of the Mississippi River that have been impaired, damaged, or destroyed by caving banks, or that may be threatened or impaired by caving banks, of such tributaries, whether or not such caving has taken place during a flood stage."

Mr. WATSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1930, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

Under the office of the Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper of the Senate, strike out "upholsterer and locksmith, $2,100; cabinetmaker, $1,800; three carpenters, at $1,800 each" and insert "foreman cabinetmaker, $2,700; locksmith, $2,400; upholsterer, $2,400; carpenter, $2,400; woodfinisher, $2,400."

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I would like to have inserted in the RECORD a special dispatch from Concord, N. H., to the Boston Herald, stating that the New Hampshire Senate has just unanimously passed a bill to protect private dwellings from unwarranted search by dry forces, by a penalty of $500 fine and six months' imprisonment for any officer making an illegal search. This, I apprehend, is another evidence that the worm is beginning to turn.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEEKS TO PROTECT HOUSES FROM RAIDS—NEW HAMPSHIRE SENATE PASSES BILL TO JAIL ERRING DRY AGENTS

(Special dispatch to the Boston Herald)

CONCORD, N. H., January 30.—What promises to be one of the most bitter fights in New Hampshire prohibition legislation was precipitated here to-day when the senate introduced and unanimously passed a bill to protect the private dwelling from unwarranted search by dry forces under penalty of $500 fine and six months' imprisonment for any officer making an illegal search.

The bill virtually declares that a man's home is his castle, and that he may keep liquor there for his own use or for the entertainment of bona fide guests. It defines a private dwelling to include a single room as follows:

"The term 'private dwelling' shall be construed to include the room or rooms used and occupied not transiently but solely as a residence in an apartment house, hotel, or boarding house."

This is the senate's reply to the persistent efforts of the Anti-Saloon League to have a law enacted which would make the buyer of intoxicating liquor equally guilty with the seller. Such a bill is now being considered by the house. It has passed that body twice in the last two sessions only to be killed each time in the senate, which now proposes to kill it again.

The act definitely states that no house may be searched without a warrant, and that no warrant shall be issued unless there is unmistakable evidence that the householder is violating the law by selling or manufacturing liquor. It provides that before a warrant may be issued the justice shall hear and write down the evidence, and preserve it for possible court action.

The senators argue that the constitution of New Hampshire protects the householder to an unusual degree, but that the proposed dry legislation would all but remove his constitutional rights. They state that in their zeal to secure evidence and conviction dry officials have overstepped their rights as officers of the law, and that the time has come to guarantee the householder the protection and immunity granted him in the State constitution.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF HEALTH

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I wish to announce that to-morrow, immediately after the Senate convenes, I shall address the Senate on Senate bill 4518, to establish and operate a national institute of health. If the cruiser bill is not finished to-day I shall attempt to get recognition as soon as the cruiser bill is disposed of.

REPORT OF THE WAR FINANCE CORPORATION

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair) laid before the Senate the Eleventh Annual Report of the War Finance Corporation, submitted pursuant to law, for the year ended November 30, 1928, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

The VICE PRESIDENT. In accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement previously entered into, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

Mr. TYSON obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. TYSON. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that the unanimous-consent agreement on the cruiser bill may be modified so that amendments introduced before 4 o'clock this afternoon shall be treated as pending at and after 4 o'clock.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, would not the Senator include in the proposal that all amendments which are now lying on the table may be considered as having been introduced?

Mr. HALE. That is what the modification provides for.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, has the Senator considered the effect of the proposed modification on the limitation of debate?

Mr. HALE. I do not think that it would make any difference in that respect.

Mr. HEFLIN. It would not change the 10-minute limitation which goes into effect after 4 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Permit me to call attention to the fact that the agreement provides that any Senator may speak 10 minutes upon any pending amendment. If all amendments are pending, it follows that he may speak as many periods of 10 minutes each as there are pending amendments, so that the suggestion in the form in which it is presented modifies the unanimous-consent agreement by extending the limitation of debate in the way I have indicated. If the general parliamentary rule that only one amendment can be pending is modified so as to make all amendments pending, since any Senator can speak 10 minutes on any pending amendment, he may therefore speak 10 minutes each on all the amendments, and that will prolong the debate very greatly.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas is correct; but that was really the understanding by which the unanimous-consent agreement was reached. It was inaptly drawn and provides for "pending amendments." There can be only one amendment pending at 4 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But the modification to the agreement would make all amendments pending at 4 o'clock.

Mr. SWANSON. That is really what was intended by the original unanimous-consent agreement, and if that had not been done the unanimous-consent agreement would never have been entered into. I believe in keeping the faith with Senators even if the agreement was inaptly drawn, and I hope there will be no objection to the modification proposed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I shall certainly not object to it, but I want the Senate to understand that when any Senator takes the floor after 4 o'clock under the modification of the unanimous-consent agreement he may speak 50 minutes if there are five amendments pending. That is the legal effect of the proposed modification.

Mr. SWANSON. That is the understanding.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If that is the desire of Senators, I shall not object.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have the proposed modification read again?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; let it be read.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, it would not change what a Senator could do, anyway. If the amendments were offered one after another, he could not speak twice on the same amendment. When he had spoken once, that would be the end of it.

Mr. SWANSON. That was the understanding.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am not objecting to the proposed agreement, but I want it to be understood.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, can we have the agreement read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the unanimous-consent agreement which has already been entered into, and then the proposed unanimous-consent agreement submitted by the Senator from Maine.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That on the calendar day of Monday, February 4, 1929, upon the approval of the Journal, the Senate will proceed to consideration of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes; and no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 30 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 30 minutes on any amendment offered thereto; and that after the hour of 4 o'clock p. m., on said calendar day, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any pending amendment, and no amendment shall be proposed after 4 o'clock p. m. of said day. (January 29, 1929.)

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I understand that the debate now proceeding is not to be taken out of my time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct; it will not be taken out of his time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, let the proposed modification of the unanimous-consent agreement be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the unanimous-consent request proposed by the Senator from Maine in modification of the agreement already entered into.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Maine proposes to modify the unanimous-consent agreement as follows:

Modify the agreement by providing that amendments introduced before 4 o'clock shall be treated as pending at and after 4 o'clock.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, there can be but one amendment pending at 4 o'clock under the rules. This would cut out all but the pending amendment, the one first offered, while it was distinctly understood that all amendments offered prior to 4 o'clock should be considered pending so that they could be voted on.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The language of the proposed modification expressly makes them all pending. In other words, by the language proposed we rescind the ordinary parliamentary rule. I have no objection to it, but I did not think the Senate understood it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator from Virginia, only one amendment can be pending at a time, and that amendment is to be considered by the Senate, and when it is voted up or voted down another one will be pending, and so on.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But the proposed agreement provides that they shall all be pending at 4 o'clock. That is the vice of the proposed amendment; but I do not object to it.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think the purpose of that, Mr. President, if I understand the Senator from Maine, is to allow any Senator who wants to offer an amendment to the bill to submit his amendment and have it on the table prior to 4 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. At 4 o'clock.

Mr. SWANSON. That is what we understood the unanimous-consent agreement to mean.

Mr. HALE. In view of the discussion of this matter I withdraw the request for unanimous consent at the present time, to take it up later.

Mr. SWANSON. I renew the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the understanding was that every Senator should have an opportunity to offer amendments and to speak upon them if he desired, and it is the purpose of the proposed agreement to carry out that understanding.

Mr. SWANSON. I think it carries out the intent of the agreement that was entered into. Senators would not have consented to the agreement if it had not been understood that amendments submitted prior to 4 o'clock would be considered pending at that time.

Mr. HALE. I think it is entirely right that amendments submitted before 4 o'clock should be considered as pending and should be subject to debate; but I do not think that any Senator should have the right to speak 50 minutes if, for instance, there are five amendments pending. I think the intention of the Senate was that each Senator should have the right to speak but 10 minutes on any single amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest, instead of the unanimous-consent agreement now proposed, that it be modified in this way:

I ask unanimous consent that all amendments heretofore printed and intended to be proposed to the pending bill—the cruiser bill—may, in a parliamentary sense, and in accordance with the intent of the unanimous-consent agreement, be regarded as having been proposed prior to the hour of 4 o'clock to-day.

That will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. SWANSON. That would limit it to printed amendments. A Senator might want to submit an amendment at 4 o'clock which was not printed and would therefore be out of order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I object to the request of the Senator from Virginia if he objects to the one I have suggested.

Mr. SWANSON. It was the understanding upon which the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into that it should include all amendments offered up to 4 o'clock The modification proposed by the Senator from Arkansas would require a Senator to have the amendment printed, and only those that had been printed up to the hour of 4 o'clock would be in order. It was distinctly understood that all amendments proposed prior to 4 o'clock should be considered as pending at that time, else the Senate would not have agreed to it. That is my understanding.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I will strike out the word "printed." I think that word should not be in there; I did not observe that it was in there, and it is improperly there. The modification suggested by me, however, will accomplish the desire of the Senator from Maine if the word "printed" be left out, so as to read:

That all amendments presented——

Mr. NORRIS. Presented before 4 o'clock.

Mr. SWANSON. Presented before 4 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That all amendments presented before the hour of 4 o'clock and intended to be proposed to the pending bill—the cruiser bill—may, in a parliamentary sense, and in accordance with the intent of the unanimous-consent agreement, be regarded as having been proposed prior to the hour of 4 o'clock.

Mr. SWANSON. That is all right.

Mr. WATSON. That is all right.

Mr. HALE. Would it not be well to add to that that no Senator shall speak on any one pending amendment for more than 10 minutes?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That will not be needed; it is already in the agreement.

Mr. WATSON. That is right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and, without objection, the agreement is entered into.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me in order that I may offer an amendment and have it printed?

Mr. TYSON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. I offer an amendment which I should like to have read and printed. It is very short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. HARRISON to the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes, viz: Strike out all after the enacting clause through the comma in line 5, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to undertake prior to January 1, 1932, the construction of 15 light cruisers, to cost, including armor and armament, not to exceed $17,000,000 each, and 1 aircraft carrier, to cost, including armor and armament, not to exceed $19,000,000: Provided."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. TYSON. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I observe by the RECORD that on Saturday the Senate adjourned until 12 o'clock to-day. I inquire what is the present order of business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is proceeding under the unanimous-consent agreement, and the cruiser bill is the unfinished business.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I doubt if there has ever been a subject more ably discussed from every angle than the cruiser bill now before the Senate. There has been much propaganda on both sides of this question. A great many of our citizens feel that the construction of these cruisers is absolutely necessary to the welfare and safety of the country; on the other hand, there are many who feel that the building of these cruisers would be a useless expenditure and an indefensible waste.

There is still another group which is controlled largely by idealism and the love of peace to the point where they feel the passage of this bill, in the face of the fact that we have just ratified a treaty to renounce war and pledging ourselves "never again to seek settlement of any conflict or dispute except by peaceful means," would be little short of downright hypocrisy and bad faith.

I give everyone of these classes of people credit for good faith and believe that they are all acting for what they believe to be the best interest of the country; but the responsibility is upon the Congress of the United States to do its duty as we see it, and in the best interest of the country.

Mr. President, I can not hope to add much to the splendid arguments which have been made, and I shall not use many figures, as every possible figure has already been presented to the Senate. There are people in my State who are opposed to this bill, and there are others who are in favor of it; therefore, which ever way I vote, I am going to disappoint some of my constituents.

I would refrain from saying anything on this subject except for the fact that I have seen something of war. Having served in the Spanish-American War, and having commanded a brigade of American troops overseas, at Ypres in Belgium and along the Hindenburg line on the Somme in France, during many stirring months of the World War, my comrades of those wars, as well as my own people, may feel that I would fail in my duty did I not express myself to the Senate on this question.

Mr. President, merely because I have served in two wars, I do not claim to know more about this question nor nearly so much as many of those who have expressed their views here to the Senate, and I have been very greatly enlightened by the discussions which have taken place.

Ordinarily the authorization for the building of 15 cruisers, while involving a large expenditure, ought not to be a question of great international moment, but, under the surrounding circumstances, the authorization and the building of the cruisers provided for in this bill become a great and momentous proceeding, one fraught, perhaps, with great consequences, not only for our own country, but it may have a great influence on the future peace of the world.

The distinguished senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], in delivering his able address to the Senate a few days ago, said:

It is perfectly evident that the construction of the cruisers contemplated by this bill under consideration looks to a war primarily with Great Britain and secondarily with Japan.

This is a very frank statement, but, Mr. President, it is necessary to speak plainly.

I look at the subject a little differently from the senior Senator from Montana.

It is true there are only two powers in the world which have navies at all commensurate with ours, and those two, of course, are Great Britain and Japan, but, in my opinion, if this bill shall be passed and the cruisers be constructed, we shall have no war in the near future with either Great Britain or Japan. It is our duty to look to the future and to take no unnecessary chances.

The question, as I see it before us is, Have we an adequate navy at this time to defend our interests under any and all circumstances? Upon the answer to that question depends the determination as to whether or not these cruisers should be built at this time.

I do not think Great Britain has any desire to have a war with us. In fact, I think that one of the last things in the world that Great Britain should want is a war with the United States.

Notwithstanding the fact that we have been twice at war with Great Britain, I wish to say here and now that, in my opinion, with the exception of France, Great Britain has been one of the greatest friends this country has had. For the majority of the people of these United States she is bone of our bone and blood of our blood.

Mr. President, I realize what a calamity it would be not only to us but to the world if we should have a war with Great Britain. I appreciate Great Britain; I appreciate her people and I would not do anything that would injure her legitimate interests or lessen her greatness, and I want to go upon record as to my admiration and friendship for that great nation.

My ancestors on both sides were English, and I feel pride in that fact. With all due respect to other nations, I feel that with the exception of our country, Great Britain has done, and is doing more, perhaps, for the betterment of mankind, the advancement of civilization, and the peace and happiness of the world, than any other nation; and though she has taken a great part of the earth, either by force or purchase or colonization, it is only just and right to say that she is not alone in that respect, and that every land over which the British flag floats is a land of law and order; that its people enjoy the benefits of English rule.

She has now acquired more than one-fourth of all the land upon the habitable globe, the possessions of that nation are found in every part of the earth, and the courage of her people is such that the British flag has never been hauled down in any land which Britain ever possessed except in the American Revolution, and then only to the descendants of Englishmen.

Our Nation and the British nation have been living in peace and amity for 115 years. With this long period of peace and friendship and with our ties of the World War to bind us closer together, if we are reasonable and prudent, we shall continue to dwell in peace and amity as we have in the past.

But, Mr. President, my first duty is to my own country. I have made this statement about Great Britain in order that our people may realize the improbability of war with Great Britain provided we pursue a proper course, for there is only one contingency, in my judgment, upon which a war can and may arise, and that contingency may arise at any time when Britain is at war with another country by interfering with our commerce upon the seas.

I do not believe Great Britain would declare war upon us; but should Great Britain be at war with one or more nations, and should she attempt to control the seas, as she has in the past, and should she interfere with our commerce to neutral countries, then we might be compelled to go to war with her in order to maintain our rights upon the seas. If we are weak in naval strength she will not consider us differently from other neutrals. It takes a long time to build a navy, and we must always be prepared for this contingency.

Great Britain has without doubt in all the years of her existence determined that she will control the seas; she has controlled the seas so long that she believes it her right; she believes it to be necessary to her existence, to her supremacy, and to the control of the great areas in every part of the earth which she now possesses.

At present, it is admitted by all that our Navy is not equal to that of Great Britain. We are behind her in tonnage and behind her in cruisers. If we are to have a navy, we should have a good one. We should have a balanced navy. That is to say, we should have a sufficient number of the different classes of ships so that all of the other ships that we have at any time may be made most effective. To balance our Navy we must have more cruisers.

It has been repeatedly shown the Senators that the United States in cruiser strength is far below the cruiser strength of Great Britain and Japan. It is unnecessary to go into further detail about this matter. We know that the United States has built and is building 18 modern cruisers, aggregating 146,000 tons; that Great Britain has built and is building or has authorized some 66 modern cruisers, with a total tonnage of 409,976; and that Japan has built and is building or has authorized 33 modern cruisers, with a total tonnage of 206,415.

It will thus be seen that the United States is far below Japan, and has only about one-third of the tonnage of Great Britain.

In 1921 we had a great disarmament conference in Washington, and went into a treaty in regard to capital ships and airplane carriers, but not in regard to cruisers and auxiliary ships. Since that disarmament conference we have built practically nothing. On the other hand, Great Britain and Japan have been building at a very rapid rate, especially in modern cruisers.

I do not claim for a moment that they have done anything contrary to the Washington treaty. They had a perfect right to build these cruisers. It was agreed at that conference that the United States, Great Britain, and Japan should be on a parity of 5–5–3 as to capital ships and aircraft carriers. It has been suggested by some that if we build more ships it would appear as if we are looking to war with one of these great countries; but I ask the question, Why is Great Britain continuing to build so that she has such a great tonnage beyond what we have? Why is Japan continuing to build so that she has a great tonnage beyond that which we have?

We must remember that our military and naval experts will tell us that we do not need a greater navy to defend the seacoast of the United States; that our seacoast must be largely defended by seacoast fortifications, by airplanes and submarines; and that any navy of the world can be kept off our shores. What we need with a navy is to defend and protect our rights far from our shores—in other words, to protect our commerce in every part of the world. Now, it is conceded that a cruiser is the best of all ships to protect our commerce in every part of the world. We further must realize the fact that our foreign commerce is to-day something over $9,000,000,000, that of Great Britain about $10,000,000,000, and that of Japan about $2,000,000,000 yearly; and that our commerce is increasing faster than that of any other country.

If Great Britain and Japan have no ulterior motive, it is to be presumed that these great countries are building these cruisers to protect their commerce as well as to defend their countries. Now, if Great Britain, with 25 great naval bases scattered all over the world at most convenient locations, needs 66 modern cruisers with 409,976 tons to defend her commerce of $10,000,000,000 annually, and if Japan, with 5 naval bases, needs 33 modern cruisers to defend a yearly commerce of $2,000,000,000, how many cruisers does the United States of America, with only 7 bases, need to defend a commerce of $9,000,000,000 yearly?

Can we expect to defend our commerce with 18 modern cruisers, with 146,000 tons, when it requires that great number of modern cruisers for these two countries to defend their commerce?

Is there any reason why the United States should not build at this time 15 modern cruisers to defend her vast commerce? If she builds these cruisers, even then she will not be up to Great Britain, and only a little ahead of Japan, in cruisers.

On the other hand, if Great Britain and Japan are arming, against whom are they arming? Great Britain certainly is not arming against any particular country in Europe, as all the navies there could not challenge her; and against whom is Japan arming, as there is no country except the United States that might challenge her in the Pacific?

At the disarmament conference in 1921 the United States certainly expected to keep a navy on a parity with Great Britain and to have a navy greater than Japan as 5 is to 3. Have we changed our minds, and do we feel that such a navy is not now necessary?

The President of the United States has recommended these cruisers, but he wishes the time limit struck out. The House of Representaitves of the United States has passed this bill with the time limit over the recommendation of the President, and by a very great majority. The great majority of the people of the United States, as I understand, expect the United States to keep its Navy at least near a parity of 5–5–3 with Great Britain and Japan.

Now, the question is, Are we justified in deferring the building of these cruisers when our Navy is already so far inferior to those of Great Britain and Japan?

Section 4 of this bill provides as follows:

> In the event of an international agreement, which the President is requested to encourage, for the further limitation of naval armament, to which the United States is signatory, the President is hereby authorized and empowered to suspend, in whole or in part, any of the naval construction authorized under this act.

Mr. President, this gives the President of the United States the right to suspend the construction of any of these ships if we can arrive at an international agreement.

The laying down of these ships is extended over a period of some three years. It seems to me that we could have an international limitation of naval armament conference even this year and arrive at an agreement, if the naval powers desire an agreement; and if no agreement can be arrived at this year, why should we delay?

It is argued that if we have no time limit, we can negotiate with Great Britain and Japan in such a way as we will not have to build these cruisers, because they will agree on a limitation of armament. If we had had no conference for the limitation of armament with Great Britain and Japan since 1921, there might be strong justification for placing no time limit on these cruisers; but in July, 1927, as everyone knows, we went into a limitation of arms conference at Geneva with these two great powers; and notwithstanding that strenuous effort was made, it was impossible at that time to agree, and we were largely flouted.

If we could reach no agreement a year and a half ago, is there any reason to assume that we will do better again if our condition is the same in regard to cruisers and armament as that which obtained at the Geneva conference?

The chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], both of whom are opposed to this bill and are for striking out the time limit, have stated that if no agreement can be had with Great Britain and Japan, then they are willing to go ahead and build these cruisers; but, Mr. President, I wish to emphasize that in my judgment our only chance to reach any satisfactory agreement on limitation of armament in the future is to build them now.

Some of the Senators seem to feel that we can negotiate with Great Britain and get her to agree to our idea of the freedom of the seas. I do not believe she will agree to anything that is against her vital interest, and we can not blame her. I doubt if it would be to her interest to agree to the freedom of the seas. In time of war she might not interfere with our commerce, because of our naval strength; but she will certainly interfere with the commerce of those neutrals which have small navies whenever her paramount interests demand it. She has done it in the past, and she will do it in the future. Necessity knows no law. If she were at war with some other nation, and feared to interfere with our commerce, she could let our commerce go free, but still interfere with the commerce of other nations, and still gain a great advantage.

I do not believe she will agree to the freedom of the seas for all nations. I think it is an iridescent dream to expect Great Britain, with her far-flung Empire, built up as it is upon her supremacy of the seas, to agree to the freedom of the seas.

Many Senators believe it was a great mistake for us to have scrapped our ships. Whether that is true or not, it is now an accomplished fact. Now, do we need these ships; are we able to build them; and is it advisable for us to do so?

It is going to be a great expense to the country to build them to start with, and it will be a still greater expense ultimately to operate them and replace them.

I believe the reason why the Geneva conference failed was because the other powers felt we would not build more cruisers, because we would not be willing to spend the money, and they could maintain their lead.

Some Senators may not believe in a limitation of armament conference, but I do. I feel that much can be accomplished ultimately in such a conference; and if we do not have armament limitation conferences we are sure to get on a competitive basis. If we can get the five naval nations of the world together under proper conditions, or even three of them, and reason this matter out, I am confident the conference can limit the number of ships that each nation is to have, and thus limit armament and limit expense. If we do not do this, there will be no end to the construction of ships and the increase in expenditures for the Navy.

It is said Great Britain expects to continue to build. If that be the case, the Navy Department of the United States will continue to demand more and more ships in order that we may keep upon a parity with Great Britain.

Japan will naturally continue to build more and more in order to keep up her parity, and so will France and Italy, and thus there will be no end to this armament race. It can only be adjusted, in my judgment, by a limitation of armament conference based upon reason and common sense. Unless we can limit armament by some sort of agreement it will not be 10 years before the Navy of the United States will be costing us annually $500,000,000. If we do not build these cruisers our influence in the next conference will be even less than it was at Geneva, and nothing will be accomplished.

When we consider the great program handed the Congress by the Navy Department at the beginning of this Congress, providing for an expenditure of some $750,000,000 for new ships, we can have some conception of the magnitude of the expenditures which we will be called upon to make if this race for supremacy of the seas is not halted.

To wait in building these cruisers is an evidence of uncertainty and weakness.

I have said nothing about the Pacific Ocean. I feel that it is necessary to be frank about this matter. My opinion is that if we have war it is quite as likely to be in the Pacific as in the Atlantic.

It is true we have been at peace with all the powers having possessions in the Pacific, with the exception of Spain, since time immemorial, but we have our farthest outlying possessions in the Orient—the Philippines—which, we must admit, are a source of weakness to the United States. If we should ever have trouble in the Orient the Philippines would be very difficult to protect, and to keep a navy sufficiently large to protect the Philippines is one of the paramount duties of this country. If we are to maintain those islands and to maintain our prestige in the world we can not under any circumstances permit them to be permanently taken from us. To-day they are practically unprotected, the Washington treaty having forbidden their further fortification for defense. Those islands are more than 4,000 miles from our Hawaiian possessions, and it behooves us as a world power to be prepared at all times to protect them if we are to keep them as a part of our country. I ask Senators, have we a navy at this time sufficient to protect the Philippines under all conditions?

We have been asked, Against whom are we building? But we have practically stopped building. Other nations are building, and again I ask, Against whom are they building?

The distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], in making his great speech before the Senate a few days ago, spoke of the fact that Great Britain seemed to be arming against us, and pointed out the fact that she owned the great fortress of Halifax within close striking distance of many of our great cities; that she owned the Bermuda Islands, which strike at the very heart of the United States; that she owned the island of Jamaica, which almost commands the Panama Canal and from which airplanes could go and reach and bomb and, perhaps, blow up the canal in five and one-half hours.

Mr. President, frankness compels me to say that while Halifax is a great port and an almost impregnable fortification and of great value to Britain, yet Canada is unprotected and Jamaica and the Bermudas very little protected, and I consider the Bermudas and Jamaica for Great Britain in much the same class as I consider the Philippines for the United States; instead of being a real benefit, Bermuda and Jamaica are elements of weakness to Great Britain, as are the Philippines an element of weakness to the United States.

The United States could without doubt take the Bermudas at the very outbreak of war, and also Jamaica, and it would be necessary for Great Britain to come and retake them. If we should be so unfortunate as to be at war with Britain—which God forbid—we would want nothing better than to have Great Britain concentrate her fleet in the Caribbean Sea, 4,000 miles from home, surrounded by our destroyers and submarines, faced and fronted by our battleships and cruisers, and attacked from the air by our airplanes from the Panama Canal, Guantanamo Bay, and other near-by points. I doubt if a single ship would ever return to the British Isles. The power and prestige of the British Navy would be broken. You can rest assured that the Admiralty of Great Britain would be too sensible to ever permit such a catastrophe.

On the other hand, should a war arise between us and one of the great powers in the Orient, the Philippines might immediately be taken, as they are practically defenseless now. They are only 1,000 miles from the mainland of one of the three greatest naval powers of the world, with a population of 80,000,000 people, with a strong and increasingly stronger navy, now having many more cruisers than we have.

If the Philippines were ever taken, we would be compelled to permit them to remain in the enemy's hands or else send a great fleet to retake them without a base at that great distance from home. This fleet would require thousands of ships and would extend in continuous line from 300 to 500 miles.

If we had an insufficient navy what would happen? No one has greater confidence in the ability and courage of our Navy than I have, but such an expedition would be one of the most herculean tasks ever undertaken. We had an example when Russia sent her great fleet against Japan in 1905. We saw the result when the Russian fleet was sunk to the bottom of the sea. Not a single ship escaped capture. A word to the wise ought to be sufficient.

Mr. President, as I said in the beginning, this is one of the most momentous questions ever presented to the Senate. It is regrettable that we have to put additional expense on the country, but I am confident it is the only thing to do at this time. We can not go into a limitation conference in the future in the condition we are now in and have that influence which we should have and which we must have.

If anything definite or of value is to be accomplished in a conference, we must be as nearly on a parity with Great Britain as it is possible to be, and we must let the other naval powers of the world realize that if they want to go into a race for supremacy in armament on the seas, that the United States, although reluctant, can and will keep its Navy on a parity with that of any other country in the world. We will then be able, in my judgment, to accomplish something. We will be able to get these naval powers to realize that it is a hopeless race, and then they will be willing to listen to reason, and to limit their armament, and yet be able to give every reasonable defense to their respective countries.

Mr. President, I am not one who wants to criticize Great Britain or France or, for that matter, any of the countries of Europe, for maintaining large standing armies and navies at this time. I have always felt they have displayed good judgment in keeping properly prepared since the World War. Security to them is the most vital thing in all the world.

I have felt since the World War that had it not been for the British Navy and the French Army and the determination of the British and French people to maintain peace in Europe there would have been war there since the World War. It was the overpowering might of the navy of Great Britain and the army of France, acting in conjunction with that great instrumentality for peace, the League of Nations, that has maintained the peace of Europe during the last 10 years. That, of course, has been supplemented by the armies of the other powers allied with Great Britain and France. Security is the greatest object of every nation.

I am not a pessimist on conditions in Europe. In fact, I do not believe there will be war in Europe as long as Great Britain and France and Italy can maintain the positions which they now hold in Europe, and, therefore, I am not expecting them to disarm so as to jeopardize their security. The great object in Europe to-day, as it is in the whole world, is to maintain the status quo.

It is true, as has been stated by the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] in his able address, that the standing armies of the countries which were allied with Great Britain and France in the World War are larger than ours, and it is to be hoped they can be reduced; but at the same time I believe that these standing armies make for peace at this time.

As long as the Locarno treaty can be maintained there will be peace in Europe, and with the great instrumentalities which have now been provided for settling disputes through the League of Nations, the World Court, and finally through the Kellogg pact, there ought to be little chance for war.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I wish to say that every country must look out for its own interests and do what it feels best to ultimately maintain its own security and safety.

The United States has isolated itself from the rest of the world. Many and great jealousies have arisen against us since the World War. We stand largely alone, and therefore we must defend ourselves alone, and for that reason I feel that we should have a navy adequate for the protection of our own great interests and for those doctrines which we have undertaken to defend.

While it is to be regretted that we have to build any additional instruments and machines of war at this time, yet I believe building these cruisers now will ultimately be found to be in the best interest of peace and security, and those are the great ends to be accomplished.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at the close of my remarks an editorial from the Washington Post, and also an article by Mr. Frank H. Simonds appearing in the Evening Star yesterday.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post Saturday, January 26, 1929]

BUILD THE SHIPS FIRST

By suggesting that the building of new cruisers should be optional with the President, and by proposing that the nations get together before 1931 to agree upon the laws of war at sea, Senator BORAH would make the peace and safety of the United States dependent upon the uncertainty of an agreement with foreign nations. Mr. BORAH says that he is willing to take this risk for the sake of saving expense.

The agreement sought by Senator BORAH would require the strongest sea power in the world to abandon its policy of centuries and accept an American doctrine that it has repudiated for over a century. There is no intimation, much less any assurance, that the great power in question will ever make such an agreement. There is every reason to believe that it will refuse to make any agreement that would deprive it of the supremacy of the seas, including the power to seize and confiscate ships under the American flag.

If no agreement should be reached the United States Navy would be in a weaker position than it is now, and the Nation would still be confronted with the duty of providing protection for its commerce or scuttling from the high seas because of the aggression of a stronger foreign power.

Unless the necessary cruisers are begun the United States during all the time it suspends building will be subject to the danger of being drawn into a foreign war on account of the seizure of American ships. If the cruisers are actually under construction, the world will be put on notice that American neutral commerce can not be seized with impunity.

Thus Senator BORAH's proposition tends to endanger American commerce and involve the United States in war. The Nation can not afford to take this risk for the sake of saving the expense of building a few cruisers.

The laws of war at sea should be made certain by international agreement. Mr. BORAH's amendment stating that Congress favors a restatement and recodification of the rules of sea law in time of war is a good proposal and should be adopted; but Congress should not make the blunder of leaving the United States unprotected in the meantime, risking everything in the hope that the nations will agree to new rules of sea law.

No nation in the world is placing its trust solely in the hope that international agreements will do away with the need of national defense. The United States should not rest its security and peace solely upon such a hope. The peace, security, and commerce of the United States must be protected by modern warships flying and defending the American flag.

When Congress has provided this protection it will be timely to seek agreements with foreign powers that will define the respective rights of belligerents and neutrals on the high seas.

Until Congress provides for the actual construction of warships necessary for the national defense there will be no certainty of national defense. Without power to defend its commerce the United States will be drawn into the first maritime war that breaks out, whether the nations are trying to agree upon sea law or not.

President Coolidge favors a plan that would leave to the President's discretion the actual building of ships for national protection. But Congress is responsible for the national defense, and upon Congress rests the responsibility for declaring war. The incoming President should not be loaded with a responsibility that does not belong to him. Let the building of cruisers be made mandatory. Then the country will be safer and not dependent upon the permission of some foreign nation to carry on American neutral commerce in time of war.

MACDONALD BRITISH NAVY VIEW HELD THREAT TO UNITED STATES—POLICY WOULD MAKE AMERICA COLONY OF ENGLAND, UNABLE TO MAINTAIN OWN POSITION IN WAR TIMES, WRITER SAYS

By Frank H. Simonds

While it is fair to assume that when J. Ramsay MacDonald, the former Labor Premier, was thinking primarily of his British public and the approaching general election, he bestowed upon the United States Senate the rather amazing warning that passage of the naval bill would spoil the effect of the Kellogg pact, two facts must be noted by all American observers.

First, one must recognize that the effect of his proposal is precisely the same as that of his Tory successors in power. So far every British proposal, official and unofficial, would in effect leave the American Navy in a position of hopeless inequality. The single difference between the arguments of Mr. MacDonald and those of the Tories lies in the fact that Mr. MacDonald is seeking to involve moral reasons for insuring the permanence of American inferiority.

PROPOSAL HELD INCONSISTENT

The second point about the MacDonald proposal is that it is totally inconsistent with his own record when in power. The Labor government over which he presided came into office after an election in the last weeks of 1923.

One of the very first measures he presented to the new Parliament was a bill for constructing five 10,000-ton cruisers, the first Britain—and I think any country—had undertaken after the Washington conference, which ended its work in the spring of 1922.

The measure was not a party bill. MacDonald did not have a clear majority in the House of Commons and the legislation was passed by a combination of Labor, Liberal, and Tory members. But Mr. MacDonald was not then willing to run political risks, such as the possible fall of his ministry, to invoke party discipline against the bill. He actually stood aside and permitted the passage of the measure, which opened the way to the creation of a decisive British superiority in the cruiser branch in post-Washington craft. It is this fact which makes it a bit inconsistent, to say the least, for Mr. MacDonald to appeal to the American Senate to display a moral standard somewhat above parity with his own.

Moreover, the example of the Labor government in 1924 was eagerly followed by the succeeding Tory ministry of Baldwin. In 1925 the provision was made for six new Washington cruisers, two charged to the Australian Navy account, while the next year two more were authorized, along with one 8,000-ton cruiser, larger than any we had or had authorized since the conference. Thus in three years the British program now approaching completion undertook to build thirteen 10,000-ton cruisers and one 8,000, in all 14 ships of 138,000 tons. In this period we built and authorized none.

DIFFERENCE IN STRENGTH CITED

We have to-day ten 7,000-ton cruisers, the only cruisers in our fleet which have not become obsolete by age. We also have eight building. Against the 10 pre-Washington cruisers of our Navy the British have 49. Against eight standard cruisers authorized after the big British expansion begun under MacDonald, we have eight authorized. If Mr. MacDonald's proposal prevailed, we should be limited to 18 cruisers, with a tonnage of 150,000, against about 400,000 tons of British cruisers distributed among 64 ships. And in post-Washington strength we should have 8 ships of 80,000 tonnage against 15 British of 146,000 tons. While the Washington ratio, fixed for battleships and designed to extend to cruisers was 5–5, between the British and ourselves, Mr. MacDonald would have us, for moral considerations, agree to a cruiser ratio about 3–5 in British favor.

Since there is at least a strong probability that Mr. MacDonald will be the next Prime Minister of Britain, Americans must be prepared to meet this line of attack. What Mr. MacDonald is certain not to propose is any form of naval equality which would be arrived at by the scrapping of British tonnage not become obsolete. No Labor government could survive in present-day Britain which advocated any such policy as Mr. Hughes proposed at Washington involving the scrapping of nearly a quarter of a million tons of new craft.

AMERICA PLACED IN FALSE POSITION

The real trouble in all the naval discussion lies in the fact that the scrapping of this tonnage placed us in a hopelessly false position. At the close of the Washington conference Great Britain outnumbered us in cruisers 3 to 1. In the next few years the British proceeded to authorize a large number of new cruisers while we sat still. The country was first under the mistaken impression that it had obtained parity in all branches. Later the Coolidge administration became convinced that it could get parity without building. Thus, while the British were building 13 standard cruisers, we limited our efforts to talking and then reluctantly undertook eight cruisers.

Unless we are prepared to accept the principle that at any time when Great Britain is at war our commerce and our merchant marine will be subjected to regulation in accordance with British interests, which amounts to accepting dominion status, we must be prepared to defend our rights with the amount of cruiser, as well as battleship, tonnage requisite. As long as there is greater advantage for the British in invading our rights than in respecting them, they will do as we have done and would do under similar circumstances.

What is hopelessly illogical about our position is the continuing notion that we can attain equality without construction, that the British will obligingly surrender a 3 to 1 advantage to please America. There is no reason why they should, and there is not the smallest chance that they will.

SEES SENTIMENT FOR BIG NAVY

But of course, as even Senator BORAH has recognized, sooner or later the well-nigh unanimous sentiment of this country will back a proposition to give us a navy which will take us out of the prospective position of a colony or a dominion, in case Great Britain is involved in war. And every discussion which ends without adjustment will simply add to American and British bad feeling and suspicion.

British policy at Geneva was stupid in the extreme, because it haggled over details with a country which always possessed the power to construct not an equal but a dominant navy. But American policy in perpetually chattering about the right to parity and then shrinking from the costs of naval construction is quite as imbecile.

If we build the 15 cruisers proposed in our naval program, then when the Washington conference reconvenes in 1931 the actual situation between the British and American fleets, if the British adhere to their present policy of a naval holiday, will be 4–3. But a very considerable number of the smaller British cruisers will be approaching the age limit. Then the question of equality can be regulated by an adjustment between replacements and new construction. Agreement on 350,000 tons might prove a reasonable compromise. But to go to the conference with 150,000 and ask the British to come down to our level would be absurd.

To reason that because we have been most active in pushing through the Kellogg pact we should abandon all adequate naval defense is, in the vernacular, "the bunk," pure and simple. No other signatory of that document has given the smallest evidence of intending to make it the basis for a reduction of its means of defense. No signatory has suggested that a cosignatory should do this, with the single exception of the British, who, through Mr. MacDonald, urges that we should indulge in this pleasant experiment.

BORAH'S PARALLEL IS GIVEN

Senator BORAH has referred in the Senate to the parallel between German and Britain before 1914 and the United States and Britain now. I have myself written of this parallel and been severely criticized by British friends. Yet it does remain true that the naval dispute has created a bitterness to-day strongly reminiscent of the earlier episode. We are undertaking to challenge British position on the seas, just as clearly as and even more dangerously than the Germans did. The British are resisting this challenge, but passively rather than actively, and with no thought of war. They have resolved that even if we build a fleet equal to theirs they will not fight us.

But, on the other hand, they are just as firmly resolved not to help us by scrapping their cruisers. They will not go to war with us, but they will oppose us by every known means of peaceful obstruction. Instead of Trafalgars and Jutlands we have had Washington and Geneva conferences, and at Washington the success of Lord Balfour put both Nelson and Jellicoe to shame. And instead of making an alliance with a foreign country against us they are using pacifists like Ramsay MacDonald to appeal to the embattled pacifists of the United States.

But the thing has gone so far now that sensible people in both countries perceive that the only possible basis for adjustment of the troubles lies in the construction by the United States of a fleet which shall be strong enough to insure that when next Britain goes to war the United States will not be transformed into a dominion or a colony, made an unconsenting accomplice of British sea power, and eventually dragged into the British struggle, as we were in 1912 and 1917, because we were not able to "wage neutrality."

UNITED STATES SHOULD DECIDE OWN WAR STATUS

Whether in the next war we decide to be neutral or the ally of Britain, we must be left with full power to make the decision on our own. Just as long as we can not maintain neutrality the British sea power will undertake to regulate the seas in British interests, as we should do and have done under like circumstances. When J. Ramsay MacDonald asks us in the name of the Kellogg treaty to abandon our naval program, the effect of what he asks is that, as an example to the world of our own pacific intentions, we should agree to permit Great Britain to continue to rule the seas. And because, as a Briton Mr. MacDonald believes that British naval supremacy is inherently right, he perceives no inconsistency in this amazing demand.

Moreover, what is most amusing about the MacDonald episode is that the distinguished Labor leader is, in effect, borrowing a leaf out of the book of the late Lord Northcliffe, whom he despised. He is undertaking to break down the solidarity of American public opinion. He is conducting what amounts to a peace offensive, which would win the naval conflict for Britain. If it were successful, this appeal of a British pacifist to American pacifism would leave British sea power supreme—and, as a practical matter, would insure that eventually American resentment would mount still higher, and the conviction that we had been deliberately deceived, however unjust, would still further poison Anglo-American relations. (Copyright, 1929.)

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want formally to offer an amendment which I think has really been offered heretofore, but for fear there may be some question about the technical offering of it I present the amendment at this time so as to have it on the table.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator from Idaho wish to have the amendment reported?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think it is necessary under to the rule to have it read. It has been read several times during the debate. I simply desire to offer it so as to be within the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GLENN in the chair). The amendment will be received and lie upon the table.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the pending measure at any length, and if the Senate is ready to take a vote I will not proceed.

Frequent reference has been made to the inconsistency between a vote for the cruiser bill and the prior vote of the Senate in ratifying the peace pact.

The logical sequel of the peace pact is not the disappearance of armies and navies, at least the immediate disappearance of armies and navies. The logical sequel of the peace pact is the setting up of some kind of machinery for the settlement of international disputes by pacific means. Ultimately the peace pact, of course, looks to the disappearance, or at least to rigid limitation, of armies and navies. But that is not the immediate sequel nor is it the logical sequel.

It must be borne in mind that the peace pact was ratified in a world already armed. It must further be borne in mind that the very discussion of the peace pact was clothed in great measure in the terminology of war. It must be borne in mind also that there was said to be nothing in any of the provisions of the pact and nothing arising out of any of its implications forbidding defensive war. In other words, the peace pact does not provide for the disarmament of any nation; it does not provide for limitations upon armaments—land, naval, or air.

No one, of course, quarrels with the effort to limit armaments, and no one would oppose a further conference looking to limitations upon armaments, whether land, naval, or air. But the logical condition precedent to disarmament or to drastic limitations upon armaments is not the conclusion of treaties limiting armaments simply, but is the setting up of some sort of machinery under which the nations can with safety to themselves disarm or machinery which will give to the nations some assurance that they may with safety to themselves disarm.

Limitation of armament without some pacific means for the settlement of international disputes merely postpones armament—that is all. The Washington arms conference, if a great conflict should come, would prove conclusively that we had simply postponed the providing of armament. Such temporary postponement may be desirable in some circumstances. Anything that relieves the peoples of the world from great and increasing burdens of taxation is desirable. But mere postponement of armament makes for waste, extravagance, and enormous loss not only of matériel but of human life itself when we are faced with the necessity of making hasty preparations in the face of some great emergency.

Therefore, when we look back at the peace pact, if one were inclined to disparage it, which I am not, because I think it makes the next step toward peace possible, yet if we look back at the peace pact and if we study the notes which were interchanged between the powers, and if we consider the extraordinary precautions which we insisted upon before we gave our consent to it, it might with truth be said that the peace pact is the great treaty of national defense. In the discussions on the peace pact the emphasis was placed on the right and doctrine of self-defense. Certain it is that it does not prohibit defensive wars. Certain it is that the definition of defensive war is left as broad as the air. Certain it is that it applies only to aggressive war. But beyond that it does not set up machinery nor attempt to set up machinery by which pacific settlement of international disputes may be reached. Unless some means can be found for the settlement of international differences without resort to war the hope of disarmament rests upon the unsubstantial basis of a dream, in my judgment.

What I have said is not in disparagement of the treaty, but I have said so much because so many of our people, in which the foreign minister of Germany in presenting the peace pact to the German people joined, have stressed the fact that the peace treaty should lead immediately to disarmament. I have said so much not by way of disparagement of the treaty, but for the purpose of emphasizing which, in my opinion, is the logical sequel of the treaty.

Perhaps it were unavoidable, but in the course of the discussion we have dwelt upon the supposed purpose and motive of other nations. We would do well to dismiss from our minds the "inveterate antipathies toward particular nations" and the "passionate attachments for others," against which Washington warned us, when we undertake to determine our policy and to discharge our duty under the Constitution.

In determining the size of our Navy we must have regard to the naval strength of other nations, and yet the measure of our strength upon the seas is not necessarily measured by strength of other nations upon the seas.

Certainly that is not the only consideration. Therefore it seems to me that a vote for the bill as it stands, incorporating in it the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], as that amendment has been in turn amended by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], is to be justified not upon a naked comparison between our naval strength and the naval strength of Great Britain or of Japan or of any other nation, but it rests logically upon the duty to provide an adequate Navy for the United States, the relative strength of other nations upon the seas being considered merely as a factor, though an important factor in the decision.

Mr. President, much has been said in the course of the debate about the elimination of the time clause of the bill. Waiving aside the question of how far the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, may retain in any event a wide discretion in the laying down of these cruisers, the Congress of the United States should exercise its power, face its responsibility, and meet its obligation. Under the Constitution it is the duty of the Congress to provide and maintain a Navy. If anything has weakened in public esteem the legislative branch of the Government, Federal or State, more than any other one thing it is the disposition of the legislature to place upon the executive department responsibilities which clearly rest upon the legislative branch of the government.

Mr. President, the admission that we should authorize the construction of the cruisers is an admission that we need the cruisers under existing conditions. It is said that the next disarmament conference may so limit naval armament as to make the construction of the cruisers unnecessary. Those who ask us to grant the authority to the President to build the cruisers, those who insist that mere authority is sufficient, predicate their argument primarily upon the proposition that if we authorize and direct the laying down of the cruisers within a specified time, we will have become parties to a great naval race with Great Britain. Be it so, but those who ask us merely to authorize the President to grant the authority so that we may have a club in our hands when we enter the next naval disarmament conference, overlook the fact that if unhappily that conference shall result as did the conference at Geneva in 1927, then, in that event, we will confessedly enter the race with Great Britain for supremacy on the seas. I would avoid it. I would rest the vote for the cruiser bill upon the necessity and the duty of the Congress to provide and to maintain an adequate navy in existing circumstances, leaving the future to profit by events which we hope may occur.

Mr. President, I have said more upon the matter than I anticipated saying, but the fourth section of the bill giving to the President the power to suspend construction of the cruisers, if any agreement is in the meantime actually reached limiting naval armament, should satisfy the most exacting. But there can be no possible objection to the additional amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], urging that the rights of neutrals upon the seas be clarified and codified. However, Mr. President, the codification of the laws of the sea will never be brought about in a manner acceptable to us so long as means for the pacific settlement of international disputes are unprovided. The world will never disarm, nor is disarmament logical, until and unless some means be provided by which nations may with some degree of confidence and assurance submit their disputes without resort to war.

It has been said—and it has been said truly—that the next war will not be a war between armies and between navies but it will be a war of peoples against peoples; that all of the resources and industries of the respective countries will be at war. Every reflecting man must accept that statement.

Mr. President, whatever agreement may be reached touching the law of the sea, whatever agreement may be brought about determining the rights of neutrals upon the high seas, in the next great war in which the battle will be not between armies and navies alone but between every resource of the countries involved, the commerce of the world will not be exempted from that conflict. There the first impact of war will be felt. I do not disparage the making of them, but it will make no difference what kind of treaty may be made, whenever great powers come to grips, and one feels that its life is at stake, if it have the dominance of the sea it will fight upon the sea against merchant ships as well as against men of war.

How illusive is the dream of unbroken peace. Ocean commerce has been the fruitful source of war. Can it be possible that in a future war, which will not be limited to armed forces on the land or on sea nor in the air, the commerce of the world, belligerents and neutrals, can hope to escape?

Whatever progress we may make in defining the law as to the rights of neutral nations on the high seas in time of war, we might as well dismiss from our minds the hope that such a treaty will be scrupulously regarded when any great power, having the dominance of the seas, believes that its life is actually at stake.

Mr. President, I shall vote for this bill as it stands and against all amendments to it except the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, which simply invites conference for the purpose of codifying, as far as possible and as early as possible, the law of the seas.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, on the 15th of January last the Senate voted to ratify the so-called Kellogg peace pact. That pact provided, among other things, for the renunciation of war as a solution of international controversies, and also stated that it would be the policy of the signatory powers not to settle their disputes by means of warfare.

Article 2 of that peace pact provides:

> The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them, shall never be sought except by pacific means.

It seems to me, Mr. President, the term "pacific means" can imply nothing, by any stretch of the imagination, that would include the building of cruisers or battleships or any other form of naval armament. "Pacific means" must imply peaceful methods.

Of course, when the Kellogg peace pact was under discussion in the Senate there were quite a number of Senators who objected to it—I presume we might call them "conscientious objectors"—and they spoke at some length in voicing their objections to that pact; but when the final vote came on the 15th day of January there was only one of those conscientious objectors who had the courage of his convictions to stand up here and be counted as voting "nay" against that peace pact.

There was a great deal of sentiment expressed for the peace pact. The people all over the Nation seemed to be for it; various organizations petitioned the Senate, through various Members of the body, to ratify it, and expressed their position in its favor. There seemed to be a general sentiment for it.

Of course, those who spoke, apparently, against the peace treaty and then voted for it may say that the report submitted by the Committee on Foreign Relations in connection with the treaty modified or changed its meaning; but, Mr. President, it was not the committee's report that we adopted; it was the Kellogg peace pact, and it seems to me that that pact must mean what it says. In my opinion, the report of the Foreign Relations Committee no more modified or changed the meaning of the peace pact than does the statement of the genial Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate [Mr. HALE], change the meaning of the cruiser bill when he states that we want these cruisers for peace purposes.

Mr. President, cruisers are not built for peace purposes; cruisers are built for war, and the building of the cruisers proposed by the pending bill means a preparation for war. I can take it in no other way.

At the present time, under the authority of former legislation, we have in course of construction eight cruisers. Two of them, I think, are practically completed, but not as yet in full operation. So I may say that all eight of them are under construction. If the pending cruiser bill shall be passed 15 more will be added to those already in course of construction, which will make a total of 23 cruisers. Mr. President, can anyone by any stretch of the imagination claim that the construction of 23 cruisers implies "pacific means"? Can the building of those cruisers be construed in any way as an evidence of our attitude to seek only "pacific means" for the settlement of disputes under the Kellogg peace pact?

If the Kellogg treaty means what it says—and it seems to me it must mean what it says—the building of the cruisers authorized by the pending bill and even the construction of the eight cruisers which have been heretofore authorized means that the Senate did not take seriously the Kellogg peace pact when they voted for it almost unanimously on the 15th day of January.

When the cruiser bill was first introduced in the House of Representatives on the 4th day of December, 1927, it provided for 25 light cruisers and some other war vessels. Immediately upon the introduction of that bill—and the bill was undoubtedly introduced at the request of the Navy Department—when it was learned that it provided for so many cruisers and other war vessels and that the amount of money required to build them would run practically to a billion dollars there was a wave of protest all over the country against the expenditure of so much money in peace time for war purposes. I recall very well that some of the newspaper reporters in their dispatches stated it to be their opinion that never had there been such a wave of protest against any measure ever introduced in the House of Representatives as there was against the cruiser bill. Hearings were held by the House committee at some length; finally it was agreed by the committee to cut down the number of cruisers, and so the bill that we have before us providing for the construction of 15 cruisers and an airplane carrier is the result of consideration by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House after the protests had come in or had begun to come in.

If, Mr. President, in the estimation of the Navy Department there was need of 25 cruisers, 9 destroyer leaders, 32 submarines, and 5 aircraft carriers a year ago last December, it seems to me there is just as much need for them to-day, and it is impossible for me to understand why the authorization was cut down from 25 cruisers and war vessels of other types to 15 cruisers and 1 airplane carrier as provided in the pending bill.

Either we need the 15 cruisers or more, or we do not need them at all. In my estimation, they are not needed. The fact that President Coolidge and President-elect Hoover have stated in no uncertain terms that in their estimation the so-called time clause should be eliminated makes it evident that at least the President of the United States and the President elect do not feel that there is any immediate need for the building of these cruisers.

I hope that the time limit can be cut out; but there is apparently a lot of opposition to the cutting out of the time limit. I do not know why. Whether the Members of the Senate who are standing for the time limit have lost faith in President Coolidge, whether they have no faith in the President elect, Mr. Hoover, I do not know; but if they have faith in President Coolidge and in President-elect Hoover it seems to me there should be no opposition to cutting out the time limit and leaving the question up to the President to decide when these cruisers shall be built.

Mr. President, we have heard discussed here on the floor by a number of Members the fact that another disarmament conference is pending in the next few months, in all probability. There is also pending an election over in England; and practically all of those who have spoken for this cruiser bill have compared the navy of Great Britain with our Navy, and our Navy with the navy of Great Britain. They have compared them from every conceivable angle—the age of the battleships and cruisers that we now have, their size, their tonnage, their speed, the size of their guns, and almost everything else, I think; but practically every argument, if you call it an argument, for this cruiser bill has been based on the fact that our Navy is not up to the standard of that of Great Britain.

There is pending an election over in England, to be held next May, I think; and the reports from the papers over there indicate that the disarmament question is going to be one of the main campaign issues in that election. It is possible that if the so-called Liberal group are put into power at the next election in England there will be a vast change in the sentiment of the Government of Great Britain on this disarmament question, and it seems to me that it would be a great mistake to have even five cruisers laid down before that time, with the expenditure of a great deal of money that would necessarily be involved in the building of the five cruisers at $17,000,000 apiece.

I do not know whether the proponents of this measure who are advocating the time clause, and insisting that it be left in the bill, are afraid to eliminate it because they are afraid the shipbuilders and the Steel Trust, the gun manufacturers, the munition factories, and other big interests that will undoubtedly get a large share of the profits if those five cruisers are laid down, will be displeased and will lose the profits that they will make if the five cruisers are laid down. It would seem to me that the proponents of the time clause practically admit, by their serious objection against having it stricken out and leaving the proposition up to the President, that they think if the time clause is eliminated the 15 cruisers will never be built.

I hope the time clause will be eliminated, and I believe if it is the cruisers never will be built, because I feel that the sentiment against war that is vastly on the increase all over the world will have a wonderful effect on the next disarmament conference, and it will mean a real disarmament conference; it will mean the cutting down of the navies instead of an increase in the navies.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the place of the United States should be to take the lead for world peace, as we did by the peace pact known as the Kellogg-Briand peace treaty, and not try to take the lead in preparation for war, as we would be doing if we should pass this bill and authorize the building of 15 more cruisers and an airplane carrier.

It is no wonder that the rank and file of our people are opposed to war and opposed to this cruiser bill, for the cruiser bill means preparation for war. It can not be taken, as I see it, in any other way.

We have not forgotten the late World War. We lost in killed, among the best of our young men, 125,000. There were 205,000 more of the same class of men wounded. There were 24,400 of those young men medically selected to go into the service who came back with their reason all gone or partially gone; and practically all of those 24,400 boys are in insane asylums or sanitariums to-day, being treated for their various forms of insanity. Those facts alone ought to be enough to convince every thinking citizen of our great Nation that we do not want any more war.

The argument that the building of the cruisers is for peace purposes and not for war is, to my mind, a most childish argument. A great American early in our history made the statement that "We have no way of judging the future but by the past." It seems to me that we can not take any other lesson from the past experience of our own Nation and various other nations than that building of battleships and preparing for war means war, and not peace.

At the beginning the World War France, Great Britain, Germany, and Russia had great navies. When Germany went into the war, of course, she knew about those navies. She also knew that if she went into the war it meant that she would have to fight Russia and France and Great Britain. She knew that their combined navies were a great deal larger than her own, and yet she went into the war. England's great navy and the great navies of France and of Russia did not prevent the World War. No other great navy prevented any war, either, so far as I know.

I have here some extracts from speeches made on the floor of the House of Commons in recent months. They were made in favor of disarmament and doing away with at least a part of England's great navy. They go on to tell about the cost of the navy and that the armament was no source of defense, and they criticize some of the wars that England has gone into as being mercenary and unfair and unjust, and in no way for defense or for protecton or for the welfare of the common people.

It has been said here on the floor that we want a great navy for insurance purposes, to insure the safety of our homes, our families, our property, our commerce, and so forth. Here is a statement from Mr. Lansbury, a member of the House of Commons, in which he said:

It was said just now that the British Navy was an insurance. I have heard that before on many occasions. I used to hear Lord Grey, then Sir Edward Grey, and I heard that famous speech of Lord Haldane, who spoke for three hours on the reorganization of the War Department, and the whole argument used on those occasions was that we were to insure that if we had a big navy and an efficient army that would really mean there would not be any war. We know that it did not come off. We had a war, and it is as true now as it has been at any time in the history of this country that every war that Britain has been engaged in, certainly in my lifetime, and every war that I know anything about, has had for its object not the uplifting of people, not the freeing of people, but the plunder of people by the most powerful class.

One of these speakers quotes Mr. Gladstone in what he said with regard to the war that England had years ago with China.

In a speech by Rennie Smith, a member of the house, he says armaments are no security:

I submit that the experience of the last 10 years proves that we have destroyed that aggressive civilization and the military power against which we were building until 1914, but we have not obtained that security which was our chief aim. The late war led to the colossal expenditure of £40,000,000,000, and the end of it, with 10,000,000 killed, we still have to face the problem of security. We are just as far off a solution as we were in the old days before the German aggression. Even this year we are spending £117,000,000 on armaments, and that is nearly as much as the whole of the seven great powers spent collectively in 1881.

It seems as if they got into the habit of building these cruisers and battleships during the World War, and they can not get away from it.

The statement has been made that we have not any Army or Navy, or anything to make a satisfactory showing with, at the present time. I have a clipping from the Washington Star of January 15, 1929. It is headed:

AMERICA'S GREATEST ARMADA, CARRYING 200 NEW PLANES, READY FOR MANEUVERS

SAN DIEGO, CALIF., January 15.—Carrying the greatest unit of Navy fighting planes ever assembled, ships of the United States Battle Fleet were ready to sail to-day from San Diego and San Pedro for winter maneuvers in the vicinity of Panama.

More than 200 planes, none over 9 months old, were with the fleet, which in itself numbers approximately 80 surface and submarine craft.

And it goes on to tell about the size of some of them.

Mr. President, at the present time we have the largest standing Army and the largest number of men available for war purposes that we have ever had in peace time.

We have to-day the largest Navy we have ever had in peace times. Now, the proponents of this cruiser bill want to have us appropriate $274,000,000 to build more cruisers and airplane carriers.

One of the chief arguments made is that the cruisers are needed for defense. I submit that there has never been a time in the history of the United States when we have ever needed any cruisers or battleships for defense. No war we have ever fought has been fought, strictly speaking, in defense. Yet it is said that all we want these cruisers for is defense. Defense of what? There is no answer to that question, to my mind.

Furthermore, in the event of a world war, there would be no defense in cruisers or battleships. As was stated on the floor of the Senate a few days ago, Admiral Sims, who was in command of the American Navy in European waters during the World War, and made a pretty good record under the conditions under which he labored—and there is no doubt about that; it has never been questioned—made the statement that in the event of a world war, if airplane carriers came here bearing bombing planes, the safest place for the United States Navy would be up the Mississippi River as far as they could get. I think he was right. He went on to explain that one bomb from one of those bombing planes would sink a battleship that cost $50,000,000 in less time than it takes to tell about it.

I have here, Mr. President, a number of clippings which go to prove, in my estimation, that in the event of another world war cruisers or battleships would be of no use in the defense of life or property. But, as I said, we have gotten into the habit, throughout all these years of our country's history, of building navies, and maintaining standing armies for defense purposes.

I have here an editorial appearing in the Washington Times of January 28, 1929, and it reads:

WE HAVE TANKS, WHY BOTHER WITH CAVALRY?

A caterpillar tractor, equipped with heavy guns, fighting men inside of it, protected by thick armor, is one of the most powerful and fearful weapons of modern war.

The tank is an American invention, developed here years ago, utilized by Europe in the Great War, can go almost anywhere.

It can cross streams, climb hills, crawl over rocks, traveling safely where horses can not go.

Such a tank as this could plough its way cruelly, remorsely through 10,000 or 100,000 cavalry, mounted men and horses of the old kind.

This tank will keep going as long as its fuel lasts; horses and their riders could do no more against it than flies could do against cavalry horses.

Having this weapon, why does this country continue to spend money on cavalry and men that ride horses, offering good targets to machine guns and bombs from the air, soft as putty before the attack of the fighting tank? The answer is simple.

It takes men a long time to change, a long time to adjust themselves to new conditions.

When they first made automobiles, they put "dashboards" in the front, although there were no horses to kick mud against the dashboard.

When they first had steamboats, they put sails on them because they said, "What shall we do in case steam gave out; of course we must have sails."

Now, they have the airplane, a machine costing $50,000, able to destroy with one bomb a $50,000,000 battleship, but they still build battleships.

And, having these tanks, they still equip and maintain cavalry regiments.

And, having airplanes in the air, they will for a while, at least, continue to send out infantry, crawling along the ground like caterpillars.

A few gas bombs, able to kill everything within a square mile of where they land, would, of course, soon end the infantry nonsense.

Nothing else will end it.

Skulls are thick, habit is strong, military and naval dodos are many of them too old to think.

And some of them are interested in the battleship building.

So the public spends hundreds of millions unnecessarily.

Mr. President, there is a great deal of truth in that editorial. Hundreds of millions of dollars are spent every year for battleships and standing armies and a navy, and for other war preparations, which might well be spent for some really good, humanitarian purpose, that would benefit all the people of the country.

I have here an editorial from the Washington Herald of December 16, 1928, written by Mr. Brisbane in his column. It says:

Chicago hears of a gas that would "destroy armies as a man might snuff out a candle." That gas was mentioned in the British House of Lords, with the warning that a single bomb dropped on a city would destroy all life within a mile of the spot where it landed.

Dr. Hilton Ira Jones, research chemist, who describes the gas, does not believe that the nations "want to use it for war, but seek a gas that would incapacitate, not kill."

The learned chemist is too hopeful.

If nations in the big war had possessed that gas, it would have been used promptly.

I think Mr. Brisbane undoubtedly is right; it would have been used. Those engaged in that war used the strongest, most powerful gas they had at that time.

Doctor Jones also showed a new metal called "beryillium," saying, "that metal will revolutionize the airplane industry." It has twice the tensile strength of steel, weighs about one-half as much as aluminum, is hard enough to cut glass, and you can not scratch it with a sharp file.

Modern warfare puts a new aspect on the war situation and on the defense situation.

Last summer experiments were carried on over London and over Paris with bombing planes. There was a sort of a sham battle over London in August. I have a clipping here from the Manchester Guardian of August 14, 1928, which reads:

Air "war" over London. Last night's spectacle is first phase of maneuvers. Bombers over Air Ministry. Eight raiders brought down, flying in gale and heavy rain.

I will read just a small portion of this:

The annual exercises of the air defense of Great Britain opened last night. Altogether 250 planes, with searchlight and antiaircraft units and special constable observers, are taking part in the maneuvers.

That was the report of the first night. Another clipping from the Manchester Guardian of August 18, 1928, states:

LONDON'S EXPOSURE TO AIR ATTACK—QUICKLY MADE UNINHABITABLE—STARTLED COMMENT IN FRENCH PRESS—EDUCATION IN VALUE OF ENTENTE

The Air Ministry last night issued its final report on the air "war" on London.

The day bombers are stated to have made 57 raids. In the course of these they were attacked 39 times on the way in and 37 on the way out. Only nine raids succeeded in completely evading the defense.

In that one demonstration nine of these bombing planes succeeded in getting by the defense and flying over the city of London. The sham battle lasted, as I recall, four days.

Here is another article from the Manchester Guardian of August 14, 1928, in which it is said:

Air maneuvers. Official bulletins. Some of the raiders reach London.

They again state that nine times the raiders succeeded in getting over the city of London.

Here is another one under date of August 16, from the Manchester Guardian. It states:

Nearly 200 planes in action.

It proceeds to state that it was impossible to keep all the bombing planes out. One of the officials stated that London was too large a target to be protected in the event of attack by bombing planes.

Here is another article from the Manchester Guardian of August 18:

THE AIR "WAR" OVER LONDON—MINISTRY'S FINAL REPORT—ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY DAY BOMBERS BROUGHT DOWN—TWO HUNDRED TONS OF BOMBS CARRIED

The air maneuvers over London are finally summed up in an official communique issued by the Air Ministry last night:

There were during the four nights 57 raids, of which only 9 were completely successful in evading the defense. In all 171 "enemy" bombers were brought down.

The New York World of August 17, 1928, also contained an article from a staff correspondent, written under a London headline, as follows:

AIR WAR ENDS IN LONDON; CITY TORN BY STRIFE—TORY PRESS, CITING SUCCESS OF RAIDERS, CRIES FOR BIGGER AVIATION FORCE "TO MAKE FOE SLOW TO ATTACK"—LIBERAL PAPER ASSAILS CLAIMS OF ALARMISTS—LLOYD GEORGE SAYS MANEUVERS PROVE NEED OF CUTTING DOWN ARMAMENT OF THE AIR

LONDON, August 17.—With half of London in theoretical ruin and the "air war" ended, the expended controversy on what the five days of mimic combat prove is in full swing. Also, as expected, the views of lessons to be learned depend invariably upon the political affiliations of the observer.

"To save Westminster Abbey we must destroy Notre Dame. That is the point to which modern civilization has brought us," remarks the New Statesman, contending that defense of any capital within range of enemy bombers is impossible.

The Tory press is already clamoring for more, bigger, and better bombers to enlarge the air forces which the New Statesman calls "probably the best in the world by a pretty wide margin. * * *"

The Daily Herald, Labor organ, adopts a pacifist view, declaring defense is impossible, and quoting the verdict of Lord Halsbury that 50 tons of the latest arsenical gas would wipe out the heart of London.

Another article is as follows:

NEED OF CUTTING ARMAMENT IS CLEAR, SAYS LLOYD GEORGE

LONDON, August 17.—If the recent air maneuvers over London have proved anything, they have proved the cutting down of armament of the air is most urgent, in the opinion of David Lloyd George, the Liberal leader.

Commenting in an Evening Star interview on the lessons of the air maneuvers, which many experts declare revealed that London was vulnerable to an air attack, Lloyd George said:

"It is horrible to think of what war in the air will mean in the future. It will be devastation, annihilation—nothing less."

Lloyd George said the whole thing showed "that pacts are not of the slightest use unless you tackle disarmament. It is useless to have pacts so long as nations are perfecting the machinery of destruction. It is bound to end sooner or later in a smash."

That is the statement of Lloyd George in regard to his conclusions as to the bombing expedition over London.

The New York World of August 19, 1928, had this to say in the headlines:

London dismayed by air-war peril. Public concern aroused by results of maneuvers. No defense possible.

This is an Associated Press dispatch from London:

The capital of the British Empire is absolutely at the mercy of an air attack from the Continent, army experts believe.

Toward the end of the dispatch it is said:

Further, it was pointed out that if attacking planes were destroyed while over London their cargoes would fall on the city and terrible damage would result. Some newspapers are frankly disturbed at the result of the tests.

The New York Times of August 19, 1928, had this to say:

Britons in dilemma. With antiwar compact near, they see air raids and great naval display.

Englishmen this week have been wondering what is the practical value of the idealism which prompts the signing of compacts to outlaw war.

The article goes on to discuss the situation there in the sham battle of the air and states that London is too big a target and that it could not be protected.

I have here another article from the New York Times of September 2, 1928, with the headline:

London helpless against air war.

I will read just a brief extract:

Umpires estimated that during the opening 15 hours of the initial attacks some 50,000 pounds of explosives could have been dropped. The accuracy of the attacks from heights of approximately 16,000 feet was almost as precise as that of gunfire.

The article goes on to state that these fighting bombing planes at that time were flown by civilian flyers, and that the ordinary civilian flyer could go into the air fight in the event of war with very little additional experience. It then goes on to say:

In the air warfare of to-morrow we are confronted not only with the destruction of buildings or ships and the comparatively few casualties thereby involved, but also with the annihilation of whole populations by poison gas.

Had the 22 tons of bombs theoretically rained upon London on August 13 contained poison gas instead of explosive they would have killed off approximately half the population of the city of London.

Another quotation states the expression of the French experts on the same proposition.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Does the Senator think under those circumstances that we ought not to have airplanes?

Mr. FRAZIER. I am using this evidence to show that the cruisers would be of very little benefit in the event of another war because the airplanes and bombs could sink the cruisers as well as destroy cities.

Mr. REED of Missouri. But does the Senator think we ought not to have airplanes?

Mr. FRAZIER. I am frank to say to the Senator from Missouri that, in my opinion, airplanes for business purposes and commercial purposes are, of course, necessary. But, in my opinion, there is no necessity for war bombing planes—that is, provided we can get an understanding with other nations.

Mr. REED of Missouri. So the Senator is against airplanes as well as against cruisers?

Mr. FRAZIER. I am against war of any kind or preparations for war.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Of any kind?

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FRAZIER. I have another article from the Manchester Guardian, of England, of August 18, 1928, which says:

The Air Ministry last night issued its final report on the air maneuvers over London—

It then goes on to explain—that London is too big to be adequately protected. In another war its vital parts would soon be in ruins and the rest made uninhabitable by gas.

Then it goes on to state what might be expected in the event of another war. I want to read just a brief extract appearing at the close of the article:

If a government can not understand what the people think and fear, it would do well to reflect on the events of 10 and 11 years ago. The Governments of Russia, Germany, Austria, and Bulgaria were overthrown by revolutions. Nor did the breath of revolution leave the victorious powers wholly uncaressed.

In 1917 French regiments turned their backs on the front and began to advance on Paris with cheers for a new social order. In the next war the victor will suffer more than the vanquished did in the last, and its rulers will hardly escape the vengeance of the ruled. The memory of what may follow another war should not leave the governments or, indeed, the governing classes (for what happened in Russia may happen elsewhere) wholly unimpressed. To make another war impossible is the first duty of every government and should be a test by which every government must stand or fall. The abolition of war should dominate all foreign policy and should be the supreme issue in every election. No candidate should have a chance who is not pledged to do this. Public opinion in England has been deeply stirred by the lesson of the air maneuvers. The government can not afford to remain unresponsive.

That is the viewpoint of an English paper. A short time after that there was a sham battle fought over the city of Paris, the capital of France. According to an article in the New York Times of September 15, 1928:

Nearly 400 fighting planes and 2,000 members of the French Aviation Corps held the "fate" of Paris in their hands to-day during the most elaborate aerial maneuvers ever carried out in Europe. For several hours this formidable army of the air, divided into "enemy" forces and "defense" forces, fought a stubborn battle, the stake of which was the capital of France.

They drew the same conclusion—that there would be practically no defense of a great city like Paris in the event of another world war and bombing planes being used.

Mr. President, there is a great deal of sentiment throughout the country against the cruiser bill. I want to read just one or two extracts from letters and newspaper articles which have come to me.

I have a letter from Dr. Frank D. Adams, president of the Universalists General Convention, written from Detroit, Mich., in which he said:

In common with millions of peace-loving and peace-making American citizens I am earnestly hoping that our Nation will not nullify its splendid action in ratifying the Kellogg peace treaty by enacting the pending cruiser bill. I can not conceive that the enactment of this bill can do other than announce to an amazed world that our action the other day was insincere and hypocritical. Can America do this satirical thing without losing her soul?

I have here a sermon preached by the Rev. Burris Jenkins in Kansas City, Mo. I want to read just a short extract. Speaking of the naval bill, he said:

Such naval races inevitably lead to war.

I think he is correct in that.

Certainly, if this Kellogg peace pact is not a piece of hypocrisy on our part, we shall not begin seeking for pacific means by building additional warships and entering on a naval race with anybody. If we mean good will, we shall act good will, for actions do speak louder than words.

In the Nation of January 30, 1929, appeared the following:

At every point the cruiser bill is indefensible, but most unworthy of all is the contention that we have no means of leading the world toward naval disarmament save the threat of 15 more cruisers. As Americans we indignantly protest at this derogation of the United States, this throwing away of all her potential moral leadership in the movement to lead the way without fear toward a disarmed world.

Mr. President, it seems to me that perhaps jealousy may enter in, but fear largely is the sole motive. The proponents of the cruiser bill say that they are afraid if we do not keep our Navy up to the standard of Great Britain, it will mean we will be attacked and our lives endangered, and all that sort of thing. I do not think their reasoning is good because, as I have stated, past experience does not bear out the contention.

Mr. President, it seems to me that it is the duty of the United States Senate to do what we can to prevent war and not to promote war, as the building of the cruisers would, in my opinion, seem to do. Members of the Senate will recall that at the beginning of the first session of this Congress I introduced a measure known as Senate Joint Resolution No. 1, which provided for the submission to the people of a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States which would legally outlaw war. In my opinion, before war can be done away with it must be legally made impossible. With the Kellogg peace pact or any other pact that we may agree to, as long as the provision remains in the Constitution of the United States giving the Congress the power to legalize, not only defensive warfare but offensive warfare, or any other kind of warfare, we are likely to have war. I still believe the joint resolution should be passed. I propose to take it up at some future time.

Mr. President, if we can agree, as I trust we may at a disarmament conference in the near future, to cutting down the size of the navies of the world, it seems to me that some proposition should be made by the United States Government looking toward the establishment of a policing power of the seas. Freedom of the seas? Yes. Let us have our seas policed by an international police power just as our border line between the United States and Canada is policed by a few international policemen now. We have about 3,000 miles of that border unprotected by any fortifications. One of the Members of the British House of Parliament in a speech referred to having visited Canada and said:

Near Niagara Falls I saw a great monument to Sir Isaac Brock, who fell in the war between Canada and the United States, in 1812; but for more than 100 years there has been no war between the United States and Canada and there is not a single fort along the 3,000 miles of boundary. The security lies in the fact that there are no forts; in disarmament they find security.

Mr. President, I think the Member of the English Parliament was correct in his statement. In the Kellogg-Briand peace pact we promised to our people world peace. If we shall pass the pending cruiser bill we shall be stating in the face of that promise we made to our people on the 15th of last month—19 days ago—that we are preparing for war. We promised peace and we prepare for war. We said in the Kellogg peace pact, in substance, that we hoped that the other nations of the world would adopt it and abide by it; but if we shall pass the cruiser bill we shall be serving notice on the world that while we ratified the peace pact we did not mean it, and we are going to take no chances; that we are going to prepare for war. "We promised peace and prepare for war," seems to be the slogan of the proponents of this bill.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, in 1913 I was a member of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives. In that year the committee held very extensive hearings in reference to the Navy, and leading officers of the Navy went very thoroughly into the naval conditions under the theories of naval warfare then existing. I have often looked back on that testimony and been amazed at the knowledge and the accuracy of the prophecies of those naval officers. After considering that testimony and comparing what those officers said would happen in case of war with what did happen, I have felt great confidence in the ability of the service to see ahead and to create a sound, constructive naval policy. At that time the same arguments were made that are being made to-day; that the battleship was obsolete; that the submarine was the great offensive and defensive weapon; that we should not incur the additional expense necessary to build battleships, but that we should rely on submarines and our coast defenses. The airplane was then, to a great extent, in its infancy; and there was not the same attention paid to it as is paid to it now.

The same argument was used that is employed now, namely, that there was no danger of war; that, while Germany was building a great navy and had a great army, it was a mistake for us to try to compete with her; and that by so doing we would encourage war. We even went so far as to sell two battleships to Greece, because there was such little likelihood of war that it was safe for us to dispose of them.

Then, in 1914, the great World War came; and we saw England and the Allies saved because of the preponderance of the British Navy which had luckily been mobilized just prior to the declaration of war. We learned then the lesson which naval officers had previously taught of the importance of a fleet in being. We saw the English fleet, because it had that preponderance, lying in Scapa Flow, able to bottle up the German fleet in Wilhelmshaven. We also saw that the British merchant marine was able to travel on the seven seas, and that German shipping was immediately driven off until only a few raiders were left to cruise the highways of commerce; and they, too, in turn then were quickly driven to port and interned or destroyed. The British fleet not only gave to Great Britain and the Allies command of the sea but the possibility of carrying her commerce upon it, and they forced the Germans to do what always the weaker naval power has been forced to do under such circumstances, to resort to commerce destroying in an effort to win the war. France had done this in the days of Jean Bart and again in the days of Napoleon.

Germany went to submarine warfare, and we saw the tremendous havoc to shipping and the very serious condition which resulted because of England's peculiar insular position, and because a weapon of warfare was being used in a way that, on account of international law, had not been seriously considered possible before the war.

Then what did we find? We found that the submarine menace was beginning to be controlled as soon as the convoy system began to be employed. America entering the war furnished the additional ships, principally destroyers, that enabled largely the successful convoying of troop ships as well as merchant ships.

The second step was when in the last days of the war a practical mine was invented, the North Sea and the Straits of Dover were mined from shore to shore, and the submarines were bottled up. It would have been impossible, however, to have mined the North Sea and to have bottled up the submarines if it had not been for the command of the sea which the battleships and cruisers of the "grand fleet" gave to the Allies.

We learn from the Battle of Jutland another lesson. In the Battle of Jutland, if my recollection is correct—and I am speaking now entirely from memory—there was not a submarine in operation with the fleet. If I recollect correctly, the Germans tried to plant their submarines in front of Scapa Flow, in order to catch the grand fleet when it came out. In that effort they failed, and when the Battle of Jutland was fought there was not a submarine active in the engagement. Not only that, but, although the battle was fought, relatively speaking, close to the German shore, the Zeppelins never came in contact with the fleet or took any part in the action. The deciding factor that ended the contest between the two fleets was the destroyer attack which the Germans launched and from which Jellicoe turned his fleet. It was the destroyer that was one of the great factors in that battle, but submarines and airplanes were not factors at all. The naval destruction wrought by the German airplane craft was practically nil, and naval experts have contended that if the Germans had made a cruiser and destroyer attack on the shipping on the Downs they would have been able to destroy more English merchantmen than would have resulted from months of submarine warfare.

Whether that is true or not, the fact remains that the dominance of the grand fleet prevented the loss of the war to the Allies.

In the Washington conference we proved that we were willing to make enormous sacrifices in order to prevent naval competition and to come to an agreement with the great nations of the world in regard to their navies. Whether that conference was wise or not the future will have to tell; but there is no controverting the fact that the United States at that conference did one of the most generous acts, one of the practical acts to prove her sincerity, that any nation in the world has ever done.

Agreements were reached on practically everything except cruisers and submarines. We agreed on a ratio of 5-5-3. I believe that the United States has a sacred duty to live up to that ratio, and when we live up to that ratio I believe that we promote peace, not war.

I do not believe for one minute—and I do not think the American people believe—that the United States should have a navy second to any other in the world. The nations at the Washington conference have agreed that we were entitled to a navy that is the equal of any other.

Mr. President, we can not have the 5-5-3 ratio balanced and carried out to its logical conclusion unless we build these cruisers. Unless our fleet is balanced in every particular, unless our fleet has all the auxiliaries necessary properly to augment its naval strength and to make it as efficient as the navies of other great nations of the world, we are not carrying out our share of the agreement, and we are not living up to the 5-5-3 ratio.

The danger after a great war is that people say there will not be another one, as they are saying to-day. They forget the lessons of the past. They think about taxes, and they are liable to let their navy deteriorate. We did that after the Civil War. At the end of the Civil War, with our advancement in ironclads, we were the dominant navy of the world; and we let it go to nothing, so that for a time our Navy was pitiable in its impotency, because it had no new vessels. The influence that we had for our own policies was weakened immeasurably. To-day those American policies speak for the peace of the world. The weight of the American people is for peace. Nobody who knows America can question that. The fact that moral force is behind our Government for peace, in my opinion, does not mean that it is not also behind it for preparedness and for proper protection. If we have the preparedness that we are entitled to—and that we should have—we are bound to be listened to with greater care when we enter into the councils of the nations of the world.

As a Senator I feel that it is absolutely my duty to vote for this bill, and to vote for it with the specific statement that the cruisers and the airplane carrier shall be built within the time limit. When I do that, I feel that I am voting for a program that is American, and carrying out one that is solely America's own business. If we build these cruisers, we will be nearing a parity with the other nations of the world. When we are on that parity, if we then want to limit our armaments, that is another question. I do not believe for one moment that other nations will find any difficulty in dealing with America as to limitation of armaments, provided we are given a square deal and our policy of having a navy that is equal to any other is maintained.

We do not seek aggression, but we do insist that this great Nation shall have the power for good that a restrained strength always gives.

To my mind the attitude of America is that of a man who seeks to maintain peace, but also seeks his own self-respect and keeps himself fit so that he can protect himself if necessary.

Mr. NEELY obtained the floor.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NEELY. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to introduce an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be read at the clerk's desk. It is very brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following words: "according to the following program: "(a) Five light cruisers during each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1929, 1930, and 1931"—

Said words appearing in lines 5, 6, 7, and 8, page 1.

Mr. BURTON. I also desire to introduce another amendment, which need not be read, which is merely supplemental to the one already read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEELY. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I offer two amendments to the pending bill, and ask that they lie upon the table and be regarded as pending; and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. HOWELL] is necessarily detained from the Senate by reason of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEELY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have had an amendment printed, and I desire formally to offer it now, so that it may be pending, under the unanimous-consent agreement.

I also desire to offer a further amendment, to reduce the number of cruisers to 10.

I offer another amendment, in the nature of a substitute, providing that this money shall be used to make toll bridges free.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. Will it be sufficient, under the unanimous-consent agreement, for Senators who desire to propose amendments before 4 o'clock, instead of interrupting a Senator who may be speaking, simply to send the amendments to the desk?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be all right.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the debate on the pending cruiser bill has extended over all the parallels of parliamentary latitude, comprehended all the degrees of forensic longitude, and sounded many of the depths and shoals of the wisdom of peace and the folly of war.

Unhappily for the tranquillity of the war-weary world, the language of a part of the debate has been intemperate enough to indicate that the dove of peace has been exiled, and that the vultures of war are swarming over the heads of the Members of the United States Senate.

Instructions and expressions of opinion which I have received from my constituents convince me that the sentiment of the people of West Virginia is overwhelmingly in favor of the immediate passage of the cruiser bill. Therefore, as the servant of my constituents, I shall endeavor by my vote to translate their wishes into action. But I would be derelict in the performance of a larger official duty which I owe not only to the people of my State but to those of the entire country, if I did not make it plain that my vote in favor of the bill must not be attributed to my sharing the apprehensions expressed, the fears disclosed, or the purposes suggested, by some of the other Members of the Senate who, during the debate, have breathed out "threatenings and slaughter" such as I have heard in neither House of Congress since the dark days of the World War.

No one can go before me in holding the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in the highest esteem. For his preeminent ability, matchless oratory, undoubted sincerity, and irresistible powers of argumentation, I have boundless admiration. But in spite of my admiration and esteem my poor sentiments are in irrepressible conflict with many of those that the Senator expressed in the memorable speech with which he held both the Senate and its galleries spellbound last Wednesday afternoon. I fervently hope and devoutly pray that many of the opinions that he so eloquently voiced are not shared to any great extent by the people of this country, or any other land. If they are, then, indeed, does everyone who hates war and hopes for peace live in a fool's paradise under the spell of a delirious dream and the hallucination of a nightmare more hideous than anything that Doré ever painted with his magic pencil, or Dante ever wrote with his facile pen.

If bitter invective, biting sarcasm, and withering scorn were lethal things, every pacifist, every hater of war, and every lover of peace would, at the conclusion of the Senator's speech, have been as dead as Sennacherib's Assyrian host after it had perished at the hands of the destroying angel. Although I do not approve of the slogan, "Peace at any price," I nevertheless rejoice in believing that countless millions of lovers of peace still live, and their number is increasing everywhere, every day, and every hour.

It must be admitted that in the Senator's address "the native hue of resolution" is not "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought"; and that it will not be his fault if the enterprise of great pith and moment of making the United States the supreme naval and military power of the world goes awry. The Senator frankly told us that he favors a navy so strong that no two countries can successfully attack us. But why limit the imaginary attacking forces to two nations and our program of preparation to 15 cruisers? Why assume that only two nations will combine against us, when the Senator so vividly describes the terrifying military preparations that have been made by France, Russia, Italy, Poland, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and Japan, to say nothing of Great Britain, which seems to be the Senator's bête noir. The Senator after informing us of the great military strength of various countries that are staggering under intolerable burdens of war indebtedness, assures us that "the war councils of every great nation have prepared plans for the sinking of the American fleet, the bombardment of American cities, and they have laid out the roads over which the armies are to travel in case of war with the United States."

Mr. President, if I shared what I believe to be the Senator's fears I should consider it my duty to offer an amendment to the bill which would provide for the building of not 15 but of fifteen hundred cruisers and billions of dollars' worth of other instrumentalities of military destruction and defense.

If I correctly interpret the Senator's stirring address, it means that we should not only build the greatest of navies, but that we should emulate the examples of military achievements furnished the world by Alexander and his phalanxes, Hannibal and his elephants, Rome and her trained legions, William the Conqueror and his mailed cavalry, and Napoleon and his vast army.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the Senator has correctly interpreted the wishes, the hopes, the ideals, or the prayers of the American people. Since the United States has just ratified a treaty of peace with practically all of the great nations, renouncing war, I can not believe that the fathers and mothers of this country want their boys to follow the footsteps of the old Napoleon, whose grand army and old guard spread the cold gray spell of hideous militarism, frightful desolation from the fruitful fields of sunny Italy to the sterile shores of the frozen ocean. I do not believe that the mothers and fathers of this land want their boys to emulate the example of Alexander the Great, who, with his iron-shod foot on the throat of prostrated humanity, wept because there were no more worlds for him to conquer, and who, in the agony of his grief, died a drunkard at the age of 33.

The Senator may scoff at the sentimentality of the mother who, with her prattling babe clasped to her breast, sings "I didn't raise my boy to be a soldier." But in spite of the Senator's blighting contempt for all such pacific sentiments I believe that that song is more popular with a majority of the mothers of America than the "song of sword" which the Senator has sung, and which, if persistently sung with his ability and skill in the various parliaments of the world, will, in my opinion, result in another world-wide war as certainly as the day will follow the night. The Senator is thrilled by thoughts of boys dying for their country. But let us experience a greater thrill in thinking of boys living for their country, and rendering conspicuous service to suffering humanity.

Is it not high time for the American people to find more happiness in striving for peace than in preparing for war?

The Senator assures us that he does "not say that Great Britain contemplates war upon the United States." But he points an accusing finger at Britain's fortifications in Bermuda; to those near the southern end of South America; to her fortresses upon both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts; and asks us to tell him why these fortresses and fortifications are being maintained, as if the answer must be "to make war against the United States."

But we should remember that these fortifications and fortresses have existed for generations. Ninety-five years ago Daniel Webster spoke of them in language if not as forceful, certainly as picturesque and elegant as that used by the able Senator from Missouri. Mr. Webster described Great Britain as—

> A power which has dotted over the surface of the whole globe with her possessions and military posts, whose morning drumbeat, following the sun and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England.

Yet with all of the fortifications and fortresses which Britain has maintained ever since Mr. Webster uttered the foregoing words in 1834, she has not made war upon the United States. And is it not unthinkable that she ever will make war upon us?

The people of the United States and Great Britain, because of the identity or similarity of their origin, language, customs, laws, and ideals, have more in common than any other two great nations of the earth. For Britain to make war upon the United States or the United States to make war upon Britain would be to destroy the peace of the world and endanger the very existence of the Caucasian race. Such an awful event would be the greatest tragedy since Calvary; the greatest calamity since the crucifixion.

I refuse to believe that there is even a probability that the two greatest English-speaking nations will ever go to war against each other.

The Senator from Missouri deplores the danger in which a nation lives without being prepared for war. Although the Senator may be the best of prophets, it will not be conceded that he is the only Member of this body who is familiar with the world's history; and if that history teaches one thing more conclusively than another, it is the impressive lesson that preparation for war has never promoted the cause of peace. All history corroborates the gospel that says—

> He that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword.

Whether in Europe or Asia or Africa, whether in the valley of the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Tiber, or the Nile, every warlike nation of the past has in its turn been conquered by some greater military power. Rameses the Second, the Pharaoh who oppressed the Israelites, carried the Egyptian arms in triumph into Asia. Later Necho subdued all of the enemies of Egypt and extended her rule over all the land between the Mediterranean and the Euphrates.

A little later Necho's vast empire was overthrown by Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, who was miraculously transformed into a beast of the field.

Next Cyrus with his host of Persian warriors destroyed Babylon. Xerxes, a successor of Cyrus, had a navy great enough, perhaps, to satisfy the desires and dreams of the "jingoes" and "junkers" of modern times. With it the ambitious and whimsical Xerxes built a bridge from Asia to Europe in an effort to conquer Greece. But after a naval battle off the isle of Salamis, which resulted in a victory for the Greeks, Xerxes returned to Persia in dismay, leaving behind him General Mardonius with 300,000 men.

The following year the Greeks, under Aristides and Pausanius, slew Mardonius at the Battle of Platea, and from then until now a Persian army has never been seen in Greece.

Time passes and the warlike multitudes of Greece are conquered by the even more warlike millions of Italy, and Greece, with all of her possessions and military glory, in 168 B. C. became a Province of the Roman Empire and even lost her name.

And the empire on the banks of the Tiber that for centuries ruled the world with an iron rod finally fell and in 476 A. D., at the command of Odoacer, a German military chieftain, Rome sent to Constantinople her kingly scepter, robe, and crown.

But it is unnecessary to go to antiquity for proof of the assertion that militarism has never promoted peace.

Fifteen years ago Germany's military preparation, in proportion to her population and her wealth, exceeded that of any other nation in the history of the world. To-day her former Kaiser is an exile in Holland, his kingly power has perished, his empire has become a republic, and the German people, under the plan of the illustrious President of the Senate, are now paying the greatest war debt that ever burdened a nation.

Fifteen years ago England, and France, and Russia, and Italy, and the United States, and Japan all possessed enough preparation—if preparation were ever sufficient—to preserve the world's peace. But all of these great powers went to war. And, strange to relate, Switzerland—one of the most civilized nations of the world—without a battleship, without a cruiser, and without a submarine, lived in the midst of the World War's conflagration, without her people ever seeing a single firebrand, flare, or spark ever falling within her bounds. Holland, without a navy or an army to compare with those of Germany or England or France, preserved her neutrality throughout the World War and was untouched by the war's desolation.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. NEELY. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator forgets that Switzerland has a system of universal military training.

Mr. NEELY. But she has never had a great standing army and her military preparation has never involved any great sacrifice or expense.

Many other similar examples could be cited to prove that those who live by the sword perish by the sword and that preparation for war has never resulted in peace.

So I purpose to vote for the cruiser bill, not as a preparation for war against England or France or Japan, or any other nation, but simply as a prudent, precautionary measure which the President, the Commander in Chief, has recommended, and which an overwhelming majority of my constituents who have expressed themselves upon the subject inform me that they desire.

I believe that war is less likely now than ever before. I believe that the world is improving, that civilization is advancing, and that Christianity is spreading. I hope for—

> The coming of that morn divine
> When nations shall as forests grow,
> Wherein the oak hates not the pine,
> Nor beeches wish the cedars woe,
> But all in their unlikeness blend,
> Confederate in one golden end.

I venture to hope and believe that the recent war, which is still fresh in our recollection, has so sickened the world with bloodshed, so horrified it with slaughter, and so appalled it with agony and woe as to impel mankind everywhere to forsake the demon of hate and swear eternal allegiance to the everlasting god of love.

May we not believe that the sun of righteousness will eventually rise with healing in his wings and illumine every highway; that the hands of the Infinite will finally make every crooked path straight; and that the pure white light of the crucified Christ, streaming down from the ineffable throne of God, will at last dispel the darkness that obscures our vision, stays our progress, and envelopes our little lives.

Instead of predicting war and delivering encomiums upon military pomp and grandeur and apotheosizing the splendors of "camps and sieges and battles"; instead of disturbing the tranquillity of the world by thought or word or deed, let us ceaselessly hope and constantly pray that the Prince of Peace, in all His glory, will yet establish His everlasting kingdom in the hearts of men, that Pope's dream of the Messiah may be fully realized, and that—

> All crime shall cease and ancient fraud shall fail,
> Descending justice lift aloft her scale,
> Peace over the world her olive wand extend,
> And white robed innocence from heaven descend.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I shall offer as an additional section to come in at the end of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the debate on the cruiser bill authorizing the construction of 15 light cruisers and 1 aircraft carrier is approaching a conclusion. The Senate is about to vote on the various issues involved in the measure.

The discussions have been conducted on a high plane and have not only covered the controversies directly involved. They have also extended to many topics somewhat remotely related to the subject matter before the Senate.

Since the cruiser bill was made the unfinished business, the contest has shifted ground. Dispute first arose over the authorization of the ships, the opposition being based on the alleged prospects for early agreement by the principal powers to limit all classes of combat vessels.

Recently, that very much desired consummation has been made to appear improbable, or remote, and many of those who at first sought to defeat the legislation now combine their efforts with such advocates of the measure as are content to secure a mere general authorization without fixing a definite time limit for the construction of the ships. The effect of eliminating the time limit would be to vest in the President complete discretion and authorize him to postpone actual construction indefinitely. The existence of such power in the Executive, it is claimed, would give this country great advantage over other countries in the negotiation of treaties for the limitation of armament.

A fundamental fallacy underlies this assertion. All international conferences on armament have heretofore taken into consideration the relative strength of the participating powers at the time of the negotiations. The Washington conference was governed largely by the theory that to adopt any other principle would tend to enlargement rather to reduction. So it seems probable that complete suspension of construction by the United States while other countries go forward, will increase the disparity and place the United States at further disadvantage when the time actually arrives for agreement. This argument is based on the assumption that in order to agree on a program of any character Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, the United States, and Germany may not be expected to break away entirely from old customs and precedents and enter upon an entirely new method or program for the limitation of their respective armaments.

If the past is to be regarded as illuminative of the present and future, other nations can not be relied on to discontinue naval construction merely because the United States has pursued or announced such a policy.

In the Washington conference bettleships were limited so as to establish the ratio of 5-5-3 for Great Britain, the United States, and Japan. This was the only limitation effected. Our country entered the conference superior to all other naval powers in battleships, and emerged from it on an equality. We completely suspended the construction of cruisers, while Great Britain and Japan actively carried out programs for cruiser building which resulted in giving the United States third rank as a naval power.

It seems foolish to assert, in view of this history, that the continuance of our present policy will result in destruction of cruisers by either Great Britain or Japan. The records of the League of Nations, the Geneva conference of 1927, and the Anglo-French project prove that whatever may be the policy of other countries, the present leadership will not advance or accept any program substantially reducing British naval armament. This declaration is not based on antagonism or resentment toward that great power. It is prompted solely by a study of the statements and suggestions made by the British representatives in the various negotiations for peace and for limitation of armament which have taken place among the principal world powers since the armistice was signed.

The British viewpoint is definitely and fairly expressed by Viscount Cecil, known throughout the world as the leader among Britons for the promotion of international peace. The British viewpoint is that security of the empire is not dependent primarily upon land forces, but is bound up with the strength of the British Navy.

Defining the attitude of his country for the benefit of certain sections of the preparatory commission of the League of Nations on the 5th of April, 1927, Lord Cecil said:

> I remember that when I had the honor of addressing this commission on a military question—on the limitation of military effectives—I explained that this was a matter which did not directly affect us, since our security was not bound up primarily with the strength of our land army. But, of course, when you come to deal with naval questions the matter is entirely different, and there I can not pretend to be disinterested in the matter. The whole existence of the British Empire depends upon the security of its communications and the freedom of its commerce, and those two considerations, apart from others, make it obvious that any question of fleet limitation is a matter of the highest possible importance to us, and when we try to put in force, as a member of the League of Nations, the obligations to put forward schemes for the reduction of our naval armaments to the lowest possible consistent with national safety we have, of course, to consider very carefully any propositions which deal with the limitation and reduction of the fleet. * * *

We can not accept a system which disregards numbers altogether, such as the total-tonnage system, and we have a further difficulty about accepting it in that in practice it gives no limit either to the size of ships or to the caliber of the guns.

The British attitude, therefore, is:

(1) That the security of the British Empire depends on her navy.

(2) That her numerous naval bases and far-spread possessions render number of ships rather than size the controlling factor in British naval policy.

Now, does anyone imagine that Great Britain is going to enter into an agreement which will endanger the security of communication and of commerce between the constituent parts of the empire? Throughout more than 150 years the British Empire has defied disintegration and revolution. She has expanded and gathered strength. Her growth and power are due in large part to the ability of her ruling class. British statesmen have been preeminent in the formation of comprehensive policies, in the recognition of necessities for change, in their readiness to respond to mature public sentiment, but, most of all, in their sublime confidence in their own leadership, their ability to retrieve mistakes and to remedy wrongs.

Mark this thought! It is controlling. Great Britain will never enter into any arrangement substantially reducing her present naval armament, because it has been planned with due regard and thorough comprehension of the multitudinous and long sea lanes through which British commerce is transported, and British ships must pass in the protection of that commerce. The necessity for numerous rather than large vessels is the key to British naval policy. That policy will not be materially changed in the early future—not until British statesmen become confident that warships are no longer necessary for the preservation of communication and commerce.

The World War proved so destructive that the hope was born among all men for the capitalization of public opinion to assure international peace. The effort was made, and it failed of complete success. The partial failure is attributable in large part to fundamental causes. The suspicions and hatreds out of which the wars of the past have come did not end with the signing of the armistice. They continued as subconscious influences, rendering impossible the establishment of that state of public confidence which is essential to any peace that may be expected to endure.

The prejudices and antagonisms growing out of differences in race and in civilizations can not be eliminated by mere treaties. It is foolish to ignore them. British statesmen do not imagine that such a practice will relieve international relations from the restraints imposed by diversity of race and custom.

Slowly but certainly the disappointment is filtering into the consciousness of dreamers everywhere. The best men in every century of modern times have looked hopefully for the substitution of justice for force in international controversies. Who does not now realize that in spite of the blood, the sacrifices, the despair and death attendant upon international warfare, the fear of warfare is destined to continue throughout a long period?

Happily, it is true that many postwar disputes have been settled by diplomatic negotiation; others have been composed by mediation and conciliation, or by arbitration.

The League of Nations and the World Court have functioned effectively for Europe. We hope for peace. The Kellogg-Briand treaty, binding the nations not to resort to war, is being entered into by all the governments on earth. Yet we know that this treaty by no means assures the "outlawry of war" or the perpetuation of international peace. It is the fact that this circumstance is not fully appreciated by many people in the country who have been in communication with me that prompts me to make this argument and this explanation at this time. The opinion prevails in many parts of the country that the agreement not to resort to war recently ratified by the Senate of the United States means the end of all military strife. It is believed in some quarters that the battle flags have already been "furled in the parliament of man, the federation of the world."

While the Kellogg-Briand treaty is calculated to encourage arrangements and methods for the settlement of disputes its chief benefits will be limited to the promotion of good will and to the stimulation of public sentiment in favor of peace.

Since amicable international relations must at last rest on these it can not be truthfully declared that the treaty is trivial even though it necessarily recognizes the legality of at least three important classes of wars—

First. Wars waged for self-defense;

Second. Wars pursuant to the sanctions established by the League of Nations; and Third. Wars in enforcement of the agreements of the Locarno treaties.

No nation is now willing to abandon its sovereign right of self-defense—defense of territory and other vital interests. The right of self-defense inheres in all human relations, both private and governmental. Nevertheless, recognition of the right of every nation to determine for itself when the necessity for self-defense arises throws the issue into practical confusion. In all wars and threatened wars of recent years the belligerents have claimed to act in self-defense. In many cases the facts have been so complicated or uncertain as to leave in doubt who was the actual aggressor.

The agreement, therefore, not to resort to war except in self-defense, every nation to be the judge when the facts justify the exercise of force, is not so effective from a practical standpoint as some have claimed that it is.

Of course, if international politics were entirely simple and no dispute of fact arose, every nation might be expected to keep its agreement not to fight, and there would be no future wars. But history discloses that the subject is not so simple or so easy of determination. War seldom results from a single cause. It is usually the product of many influences and seldom occurs until antagonisms have become so fierce as to make reconciliation impossible. Those rivalries among nations and peoples, which are the outgrowth of diverse habits and customs and race, can not be suddenly abolished by mere treaties, whether entered into by diplomats or in conferences.

The admitted fact that the world is now burdened with heavier and more expensive armaments than during the prewar period, notwithstanding the subject of the limitation of armaments has been before the various nations of the world continuously since the great guns groaned into silence in 1918, is indicative of the absence of that mutual confidence and good will which is indispensable to an enduring peace.

Inventive genius still applies itself to the creation of destructive machines of war.

The nations refuse to limit armament. The preparatory commission of the League of Nations has been at work continuously, but has been unable to agree on a program for limitation. Nothing worth while has been accomplished or is assured in the early future respecting the reduction of armament. Commissions have broken up, conferences have dispersed in irreconcilable disagreement. France and Italy insist on the limitation of the total tonnage of war vessels, while Great Britain and the United States agree that four classes of warships must be dealt with and the tonnage of each class limited.

Great Britain and France, under the Anglo-French project, would limit the number and tonnage of large cruisers suitable to the purposes of the United States and leave practically unlimited the number or total tonnage of small cruisers adapted to the purposes of Great Britain.

In the light of the present status of disarmament, the Washington conference accomplished nothing worth while. It merely postponed the real issue in disarmament, both as a factor and as a consequence of international peace.

By all means let future conferences be held. Let every possible effort be made to secure arrangements for limiting the dreadful burdens imposed in the name of national defense. It is unfortunate that efforts for the reduction of armament should have failed. It is regrettable that the future gives no assurance that renewed attempts are destined to succeed. The program carried in this bill is justified from every standpoint of the public interest. It can affront no nation which has been building cruisers while the United States has totally suspended such construction. It is the cheapest possible guaranty of the protection of our commerce and possessions. The United States does not expect war; but there is no certainty that her commerce, as a neutral, may not be threatened or destroyed. Any war, wherever it commences and whatever powers it may involve, will menace neutral commerce. A people fighting for their existence are never restrained by mere ethical considerations. The only protection to neutral commerce in time of war is adequate sea power. The rights of neutrals on the seas were disregarded during the late World War, and they will be given little recognition in case of future conflicts if the success of either belligerent appears to depend on overriding them.

No patent process has been discovered whereby the human race, with its diversity of religious, racial, and political institutions, can progress in complete harmony free from the dread—one might almost say the necessity—of sharp conflicts which may result in war. When that diversity disappears world-wide standardization in ideals and in social, political, and industrial systems will have come. Such a consummation is not desirable. It is in the limbo of things dreadful and remote.

Treaties promotive of good will; tribunals for the peaceful settlement of differences; plans for limitation of armament—all these will be helpful in maintaining international peace. Just as in the best-regulated governments adequate police agencies are required for the protection of life and property, so in the sphere of international relations no nation can be expected to disband its army and scrap its navy, relying solely on the justice of other peoples to protect its territory and its citizens.

Among the constitutional duties and powers of Congress is that to provide and maintain a navy. This means a navy adequate for national purposes and requirements. The prompt construction of the vessels contemplated by this bill is essential to the maintenance of a properly balanced and efficient navy.

No wholesome end can be accomplished by eliminating the time clause, and thus placing upon the Executive a responsibility which under the Constitution falls upon the legislative department. Undoubtedly this would afford an easy way out of the present controversy. It would save, in some degree, the faces of those who have opposed the construction of cruisers, and it would leave the practical results wholly dependent on the Executive—on the President and the Bureau of the Budget.

Convinced that these ships will form no part of a competitive program, that they are essential to an adequate navy, and that their construction will facilitate rather than impede the limitation of naval armament, I give this measure my hearty support.

It has been said that the enactment of this measure may occasion a deficit in the United States Treasury. I recall that when the Congress first passed the bill providing adjusted compensation for the veterans of the World War, the then President vetoed the bill on the ground that it would cause a deficit in the Treasury. For every year that has come and gone since that bill was passed there has been a large surplus in the Treasury of the United States, notwithstanding the declaration of the President who vetoed the bill to the contrary; and I have little faith in the assertion that any substantial ground of opposition to this measure can be based on a prospective deficit in the revenues of our Treasury. The same thing will result in that particular that came about with regard to the enactment of the adjusted compensation bill. The passage of this measure does impose an additional charge on the Treasury of the United States; but the elimination of the time clause will not diminish in the slightest degree the amount of that charge, unless the argument be based on the assumption that the President will not in fact construct the ships; and, if that be the argument, then I am emphatically against the elimination of the time limit.

Congress has the duty to determine this question. We have been debating it now for a very long period. Every phase of the subject has been considered. My conclusion is that the Members of the Congress, every one of us, should assume the responsibility which the fundamental law of the land imposes upon us, and not leave to the Director of the Budget or to the President or to any executive authority the performance of a duty, the determination of an issue, that really devolves upon us.

The United States Navy has never been an instrument of oppression. It is not likely to endanger or interfere with the rights of other nations. Considered as an instrumentality of national defense, one must keep in mind the vast stretches of our continental coast lines, almost wholly unprotected save by naval armament. Alaska, the Hawaiian Islands, the Philippines, the Panama Canal, Porto Rico, and other island possessions are under the protection of our Navy. Our commerce extends to almost every port and is still expanding. Its security in the early future can only be assured through adequate merchant and naval vessels. No program for disarmament that may be expected will contemplate a reduction of the cruiser strength below that carried in this measure. There is not the slightest likelihood that any ship constructed under this plan will be scrapped unless the United States shall become content to accept a position of mediocrity among naval powers. That I am not willing to vote for or even to discuss.

Without boasting, one may take pride in the record and traditions of the United States Navy. From the days when John Paul Jones, defying the lightning and the storm, carried the War for Independence into enemy harbors; down through the struggle of 1812; still later to the death grapple between the Merrimac and the Monitor, and amid the thunder of the guns at Santiago and Manila; aye, even throughout the World War, the Navy of the United States reflected honor and glory upon our flag, and gave security to our commerce, and contributed indispensably to the triumph of our cause.

It is with the firm conviction that a strong navy is the best insurance that can be procured—insurance during peace and in war—that I cast my vote for the pending bill and against the amendment eliminating the time clause.

Mr. McMASTER obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me that I may offer an amendment? Under the rule governing our procedure I can not offer it after 4 o'clock.

Mr. McMASTER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. To comply with the rule, I offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRATTON in the chair). The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, I desire also to offer an amendment which I propose to discuss very briefly, and then will offer the amendment at the proper time.

The object of the amendment which I propose to offer is to provide that when Congress shall declare war all Members of Congress up to the age of 55 years, the chief executives of all corporations whose capital exceeds $5,000,000, and the members of all partnerships whose individual or combined responsibility exceeds $5,000,000 shall be impressed into military service in the zone of actual hostilities.

The first question that arises is as to the nature of the military duties which men up to the age of 55 may perform. I am informed by men of wide military experience that men up to the age of 55 may perform many necessary and useful duties in war time in the zones of actual hostilities; and, as a matter of fact, the Germans and the French at the age of 60 years, in the zones of actual hostilities, performed many necessary and valuable services.

In the history of civilization, long before organized government made its appearance in the world, the unit of society was the family or the tribe, and the head of that family, who was called the "old man," exercised despotic power over his subjects. If an enemy tribe or family trespassed on his fishing or game preserves he ordered the youth to go out and kill and slay the enemy, and not to return until the end was accomplished. Civilization has not changed in any great respect along that line. Instead of having the "old man" wielding despotic power over his subjects, to-day we have what is known as the ruling class in every nation which dominates, rules, and controls the affairs of each country. The legislative assemblies and the classes enumerated in this amendment constitute the ruling classes of America as well as the ruling classes in all nations.

It is the youth of the world that always bears the brunt of war. It is perfectly proper, because of their physical fitness and virility, that they should bear the brunt of war. No one complains about that, not even the youth itself. But there is something inexpressibly fine about youth. It is noble and generous, courageous and heroic. The youth of the world has its own philosophy, and that philosophy of youth clearly understands and comprehends that there is not one logical reason in the world why there should not be an international limitation of armaments.

The philosophy of that youth clearly understands that with unlimited armaments of the world, there is no universal application of the principles of justice, because the small nations of the earth have no voice in the determination of their own affairs; that when war is declared, the small nations of the earth can not determine their choice because of right or justice, but must choose after a consideration of which side is the stronger, and make their alignments accordingly.

The youth is perfectly willing to fight these wars, and to bear the brunt of war, but when Congress declares war, and says to the youth of America, "This is a righteous war, and so firm are our convictions in regard thereto that we are willing to share with you the responsibilities," then, when the youth of the country realizes that the great millionaire executives of the country, whose property is to be defended by the war, are willing to leave their business, are willing to leave their palatial homes, and the physical comforts which they daily know, and are willing to join with the farm boys and the mill boys of America and fight side by side with them, a new confidence will be inspired in the heart of the youth, and the whole morale of the Nation will be quickened and stimulated, constituting a powerful factor in the prosecution of the war.

The object of this amendment is twofold. It will not only stimulate the morale of the Nation in time of war but it will accomplish a far greater purpose than that.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMASTER. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator's amendment would send Senators and Representatives under the age of 55 into the war, but I see that a recent ruling of the War Department is to the effect that a Senator has the rank of a major general and a Representative that of a brigadier general, and in the Army officers of those ranks do not retire until they are 64. Therefore I think the Senator ought to raise his age limit to 64.

Mr. McMASTER. I would be perfectly willing to raise it, if the Senate desired to do so.

The millionaire executives of this country exercise a powerful influence, not only in national but in international affairs. They guide and direct the commerce and the industry of the Nation, and too great tribute can not be paid to their ability and their genius and their usefulness to society. This amendment is not directed at those men because they are rich but it is directed toward them because of the fact that if it were adopted there would be brought home to them a keen responsibility of what war means. There would be driven home to them the fact that war means not only hell to the masses but to them as well. Then, the ability and the genius of these men would be directed along the lines of formulating international diplomacy that would make for peace instead of making for war.

Mr. President, during the centuries the ruling class in every country has shaped all national policies and all international policies, and has shaped and determined the diplomacy of the world. They have built armaments in the name of peace, they have promised peace and safety and security to civilization, and with what result? Wars, greater wars, and still greater wars, have been the sum total of their efforts, and there is being laid to-day the foundation for the greatest war in all history, due to the world ambition for trade of the ruling classes of the world.

In every generation, when this ruling class sees that its ambitions for world trade are about to go toppling down in failure, it steps aside and says to the youth of the world, "We have made a miserable failure of the whole business. Now you go out and right these miserable mistakes with fire and the sword." And hundreds of millions of youths of the world have obeyed that command and poured out their blood to atone for the miserable mistakes of the elders.

The efforts of this ruling class, during all of the time it has had charge of the affairs of the world, and most assuredly up to the present hour, have resulted in a monumental failure, so far as international diplomacy is concerned. Is it not about time that the ruling classes of the world shall say to the youth, "We will be honest and square with you. We have played this game long enough at your expense. We are willing now to accept responsibility for our acts." When that time comes, while the youth is always willing to bear the brunt of these wars, it will have much more respect for the elders if they are willing to share the responsibility of the war.

In this age-old diplomacy that is filled with blunders and mistakes which so completely fill the chapters of history, what is the tragic end of it all? In every nation that is old in years, after the youth have been lied to time and time again, after facts have been cruelly misrepresented to them, when generation after generation has poured out its treasure of gold and blood in war, and the mistakes and the intrigues of the ruling class have been piled mountain high, what is the aftermath? There always arises in that country a man with a dynamic and a magnetic personality, with a fair knowledge of history and economics, but with a perfect knowledge of human psychology, who pours into the ears of the youth the deadly facts of the mistakes and the cruel blunders and the intrigues of their elders, and the youth, who constitute the soldiery of the country, rally around his banner, a dictator is born, down goes the government, and the old régime is blotted out. No less than 10 to 15 times in the last decade has that very thing happened before the eyes of the world, and that is the tragic climax to the miserable drama.

At the end of the World War certain of the Central Powers and the allied powers were sure as to who caused the war, but after the passion and the heat of the war had subsided and a calm investigation was made as to the causes of the war, under the direction of the Historical Society of Paris, particularly led by Professor Renouvin, of the University of Paris, he said in substance, "We may never know the exact causes of that war, but it was not a one-sided war. All parties thereto bore some guilt." He said the seeds of the war were sown 30 years ago; that it was an economic war, and then, after reciting the coalitions that were formed by the Central Powers and by the allied powers beginning with 1907 and 1908, he said this:

> The idea of an inevitable war tended to spread. The state of European politics, the race for armaments, the growing rivalry of the two groups of powers, seemed to be leading toward it unavoidably. People were actually waiting for the conflict to begin. When a statesman reaches this conviction, he reasons and acts as though the current were invincible. He must make the necessary preparations for the conflict without actually believing that it is coming. How can the stream of destiny be turned aside?

That was the greatest world war in all history, a war where all parties thereto bore some guilt, the result of the trade policies and the ambitions of the ruling classes of the world.

Now, let me quote the opening sentence of an editorial in the New York World in reference to this particular amendment that has been offered. The World said:

> It is a common observation that if it were possible to eliminate all profits from war and to compel statesmen who declare war to go to the front with muskets, it would be a long while before another armed conflict would take place.

If according to this editorial the conscription of property would postpone war for many a day, then the conscription of life would effectually prevent war. It is a certainty that when the bodies of the ruling classes feel the withering touch of the flame of war and accept responsibility for their acts then sanity and common sense and honesty will be translated into the diplomacy of the world.

Theodore Roosevelt, the great American, in times of war never asked an American boy to do that which he himself was not willing to do. If the philosophy of Roosevelt were translated into the fundamental law of every land, a new hope would be borne in the breast of mankind for the peace and the safety and the security of the world.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, during the debate in the Senate it was said a number of times that the Kellogg peace pact was nothing more than a gesture. With this view of the pact I can not agree. I think it is much more than a gesture. It seems to me it is an expression of the will and desire of the people of the world for peace; it is a pledge by the governments of the world to recognize this undoubted feeling on the part of the peoples themselves. Just at this time this feeling does exist strongly in practically every civilized country of the world. But it must not be forgotten that very few cases have occurred in history where wars have been fought against the wishes of the people of the countries at war.

This desire for peace is not manifesting itself during our day by any means for the first time in history. It is really the normal feeling of the world in times of peace; but when occasions for war arise it takes very little to turn this normal desire for peace into a very active desire to get at each others' throats.

The Kellogg peace pact, which acknowledges that every country has the right to make war in self-defense or when so obligated to do under the treaty of Versailles or the Locarno treaty, or the French private treaties, does not by any means guarantee that there will be no more war.

It is not a treaty relying on which any country can afford at the present time to relinquish its armament or to reduce it below its national needs unless the other countries of the world do likewise, and this is particularly true in regard to naval armament.

The real value of the treaty will be developed in the future. It is my opinion that its chief value will not be developed until some one of the great world powers signatory thereto has violated the treaty, and then its value will depend entirely upon the degree of coventry exercised against the treaty-violating power by the other nations signatory.

If the treaty is to survive such a violation and to have any measurable effect in the future, the nonoffending nations must in some tangible form so express their disapproval that thereafter neither the offending nation nor any other nation will dare to repeat the offense. Otherwise the treaty will not be worth the paper on which it is written and will be a mere evidence of the vanity of the hopes of the world for abolition of war.

Let us see to it that this great country of ours, the richest and necessarily the most envied country in the world, does not furnish cause for the violation of the Kellogg treaty. Let us so keep up our national defenses that no other country in the world shall have any temptation to violate the terms of the treaty in so far as we are concerned, and attack us or wrongfully to interfere with our rights, thereby putting itself in the position of violating the treaty to which we are both signatories; that we on our part shall not because of our military strength assume the rôle of the treaty violator. The great material advantages to our country of a condition of world peace, our frequent and honest endeavors to have adopted a code of laws for the sea, and our well-known and proven policy of not wishing to add to our territorial possessions should be a sufficient guaranty to the rest of the world.

Mr. STECK. Mr. President, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], our leader, has said, every phase of this question has been covered, but I wish in a few moments to give my reasons for voting for the pending legislation, together with the time limit.

Mr. President, I intend to vote for the pending legislation—

Because the first duty of a government is the common defense.

Because the Constitution makes it the duty of Congress to provide and maintain a navy and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for the common defense.

Because this duty can not be shifted by Congress to either of the other branches of our Government.

Because I will not be led from what I conceive to be my duty as a Member of Congress by the activities of any group or organization, however earnest and active they may be.

I intend to vote for this legislation—

Because I am convinced that the cruisers provided for in the bill are immediately necessary to provide a naval force adequate for the common defense, and because I have confidence in the judgment of our President, who, as Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, considers them necessary, and who has said:

> It is our duty to ourselves and to the cause of civilization, to the preservation of domestic tranquillity, to our orderly and lawful relations with foreign people, to maintain an adequate Army and Navy.

I shall so vote—

Because of the warnings of Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, and Roosevelt, and because I believe with our President-elect Mr. Hoover that—> there are two cooperating factors in the maintenance of peace—the building of good will by wise and sympathetic handling of international relations and the adequate preparedness for defense—that—

> We must not only be just; we must be respected.

Because while I hope for everlasting peace I realize that the only real guaranty we have against attack is to let the world know that we are prepared and disposed to defend ourselves.

Because I know that only by actual conflict was our Nation established; that only by actual conflict has it been preserved, and because I am more interested in the safety and welfare of my own country than in that of any other nation or nations.

And, finally, I shall vote for the bill because I am convinced that the people I in part represent overwhelmingly demand a navy of sufficient size to keep inviolate the shores of our country and of our possessions, to safeguard our commerce on all the seas, and to protect our citizens and their property wherever they may properly be.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the ratification of a treaty not many moons ago is fresh in our minds. The Senate ratified the multilateral peace pact outlawing war and providing for the pacific settlement of all international disputes. While I voted against ratification for the reasons I set forth in the debate, and while I entertain misgivings as to the value of that treaty modified, as I believe it to be, by reservations and interpretations of foreign governments, and while I entertain grave apprehensions of the ultimate consequences of the treaty, I feel that it is my duty as an official now to accept that treaty in good faith at its face value and resolve the presumption in favor of the honesty and integrity of our Government and other governments adhering to the treaty, until that presumption is overcome by the facts of future history.

When the treaty has been ratified by the governments proposing the treaty, it goes into effect as soon as the instruments of ratification have been deposited at Washington, and it then becomes under our Constitution the supreme law of the land, binding equally upon all citizens and all officials.

If nations are sincere and diplomats are not all liars, under the treaty there should be no wars—no, not even defensive wars, for there can be no defensive warfare until there is an assailant. Being one of the first nations to ratify the treaty, it would, in my judgment, seem ironical if America were to become the first Nation to prepare for war. My vote, therefore, will be cast against the cruiser bill.

On the day when the treaty was voted upon in the Senate, representatives from the so-called peace organizations of the country and women's clubs filled the Senate Office Building, importuned the Senators of the respective States—preceding those importunities with public mass meetings—flocked into the corridors and waiting rooms of the Nation's Capitol and filled the galleries of the Senate Chamber in an effort to demonstrate their "passion for peace," so eloquently portrayed by the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

On the day of ratification the dove of peace fluttered about the Senate floor and the Senate galleries. It perched upon the desk of every Senator, then fluttered about the part-time militant Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and the erstwhile nationalist, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], seductively billing and cooing them with an innocuous committee report, and as the vote was taken it perched high above the Presiding Officer, with its head gently turned to hear the sweet refrain as the Senate, by the roll call, joined in the hallelujah chorus of peace with but a single discordant vote.

While the Senate is about to take a vote filling the Nation's waist belt with tomahawks for a competitive struggle in the international game of scalping, the braves have laid aside the peace pipe. The representatives of the peace organizations of the country and the women's clubs are all absent. The seats they once occupied during the consideration of the peace pact are now reserved for the gentlemen who rattle the saber. The dove of peace, a temperamental creature, has taken its flight and is now perched high in the loft of some deserted barn. Its wings have drooped, its feathers are disheveled, its eyes turned to the dull dreariness of shattered hopes, and no longer does it bill and coo. Indeed, the "passion for peace," like so many other passions, flamed and flared forlorn in the blackness of the night, flickered and was snuffed out at the break of day.

The braves have returned from their bivouac of peace, and now, with the beating of the drums, the war dance begins. On Monday they feed on raw meat and shout for war. On Tuesday they breakfast on the tongue of a barnyard fowl and cackle for peace. But I observe that in this debate the roar has been louder than the cackle.

Mr. President, the debate on the peace pact, the debate on the cruiser bill, the justification, as has been alleged upon the floor of the Senate, for the building of 15 additional cruisers, in my opinion portends nothing less than war. Indeed, the nations of the earth, begging for peace, begging for cessation of the giving of their blood in useless warfare, must look upon America to-day, as she welds her armor of steel with the white heat of the passions of war, as a doubtful leader for peace.

Mr. President, every cruiser, every battleship is an instrument of destruction; and in the hands of America, great, powerful, and wealthy as she is, it is a warning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRATTON in the chair). The time of the Senator on the pending question has expired.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, speaking, then, on the amendment—should we pass this bill it will be a warning to the nations of the world that America, when she joined in the Kellogg peace pact, intended to mislead the peoples of the world. We shall stand before the world as a nation, by our voice speaking for peace and by our acts preparing for war.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I disagree with the position taken by my distinguished friend the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE]. It does not seem to me that a vote to provide cruisers is any more a vote for war than voting for policemen and police patrols is voting for crime, or voting for fire engines and firemen is voting in favor of fires. I believe in peace with righteousness, peace with justice, and peace with honor. Human nature being what it is, and the nations of the world being composed of human beings, I believe that we shall be more likely to get peace with honor and peace with justice if we are ourselves strong and prepared for the worst than if we are weak and whining for others to disarm because we ourselves do not care to arm.

The hour is late, Mr. President, and I shall not address myself at any further length to the general aspects of the bill, which seems to me to be directly in line with the injunction in Washington's last message, that the cost of preparing against war is always less than the cost of war. I do desire, however, to address myself for the remainder of my time to an amendment which I have sent to the desk, which provides for the building of two additional aircraft carriers.

In the original program for Navy development, for the rebuilding of the outworn ships and the construction of new ships—a program sent to the Congress last winter and approved by the President, the statement being made that it was not in conflict with the financial program of the President—25 cruisers and 5 aircraft carriers were provided for. After prolonged hearings the House committee prepared a bill which provided for a reduction of two-fifths in the number of cruisers, making the number 15 instead of 25, and a reduction of four-fifths in the number of aircraft carriers, making the number 1 instead of 5. It seems to me that that was a very unfortunate act on the part of the House of Representatives. The amendment which I have proposed provides for the adding of two aircraft carriers to the bill, one aircraft carrier to be built in each year that we build five cruisers.

In order that the sentiment of the highest authorities of the Navy on this matter may be known, I ask to read from the statement of Admiral Hughes, the Chief of Naval Operations, made a year ago, in January, before the House committee on aircraft carriers, in which he says:

Aircraft carriers are becoming each year more necessary for fleet efficiency. Our present effective strength consists of only two units, the Saratoga and Lexington, and the loss of one of these units would reduce our carrier force by 50 per cent.

I interject there to remind Senators that a few days ago at the maneuvers off the Panama Canal, the great naval maneuvers of the year, our two aircraft carriers were engaged and one of them was "put out of action" very early in the maneuvers. That enabled the other one, by skillful use of one of its airplanes, to bomb the Panama Canal in such a way as to prevent the Atlantic Fleet from joining the Pacific Fleet and to force it to take its way around Cape Horn.

Due to the increased efficiency that will be obtained from numbers of mobile landing and operating stations, as well as to the extreme vulnerability of this type of vessel, numbers of smaller carriers should be built, rather than a few large carriers.

The mission of an air carrier is to provide a mobile base for airplanes in areas and at such time as will insure an effective employment of its own planes and the planes of other types of combatant ships in company which can launch planes, but upon which planes can not land. Carriers provide the only satisfactory means of reservicing the planes of all ships of the fleet in the presence of an enemy, as it is manifestly impracticable for combatant ships to stop and recover planes in the presence of an enemy. The types of operations in which carriers are likely to engage during war are as follows—

First, fleet action; second, scouting operations; third, defense of commerce; and, fourth, attack on shore objectives—naval and military.

I will not read, Mr. President, all that he says at this time; but will ask permission that it may be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

(1) Fleet action: Airplanes in a major action would be used for attacking enemy planes, bombing enemy combatant ships, strafing attacks against heavy and light forces, torpedoing capital ships, laying smoke screens, tactical scouting, and observation of gun fire. To perform these functions, control of the air must be gained and maintained; this involves destruction of enemy planes. To accomplish the above functions, planes must be reserviced and a large number of landing platforms in the battle area are required to prevent congestion in servicing planes and possible actual disaster to planes.

(2) Scouting operations: Early information of the presence of the enemy, even at a great distance from the fleet, or his absence from certain areas, is of great importance to the commander in chief. Under favorable weather conditions such information may be obtained by planes flown from carriers, and the greater the number of carriers the greater the area and the more effectively can it be covered; but carriers must, at all times, be amply protected by cruisers or destroyers, or both.

(3) Defense of commerce: By locating and attacking enemy combatant ships operating on our lines of communications and by informing our own forces of the location of enemy combatant and merchant vessels aircraft will render great aid in maintaining our sea communications and denying same to the enemy.

(4) Attack on shore objectives—naval and military: In such attacks the chance of accomplishing the mission is greatly increased by the number of flying off and flying on decks within striking distance of the objective.

In view of the above we should build up our carrier tonnage to the treaty limit of 135,000 tons.

AIRCRAFT-CARRIER SITUATION AT THE PRESENT TIME ON A TONNAGE BASIS

At the present time the tonnage of aircraft carriers built, building, and appropriated for is as follows:

	Tons
United States	78,700
British Empire	107,550
Japan	63,300

Of the above the following tonnages are classed as experimental and may be replaced as desired:

	Tons
United States	12,700
Great Britain	70,350
Japan	9,500

The tonnage of aircraft carriers allowed by the Washington treaty is as follows:

	Tons
United States	135,000

Mr. BINGHAM. Admiral Hughes calls attention to the fact that under the Washington conference treaty we were permitted to build 135,000 tons of aircraft carriers; Great Britain the same tonnage; and Japan 81,000 tons. At the present time our tonnage of aircraft carriers is 78,000, while Great Britain's is 107,000, and Japan's 63,000. Japan has approached far more nearly to her quota than we have, for we are still 56,300 tons under the treaty allowance.

Mr. President, I should like also to call attention to the testimony before the House Naval Affairs Committee of the Hon. Edward P. Warner, Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Aviation, in which he points out the necessity of having a number of aircraft carriers in order that we may learn to use them. He states that it is of the greatest importance there should be more than one airplane carrier with each one of the fleets engaging in maneuvers. During the last war no aircraft carriers were used at all, and we know very little about how they will behave and what will be their tactics during war time.

I quote from Mr. Warner:

* * * The only chance from gaining experience with aircraft carriers which will give our naval officers and professional men a really extended and full knowledge of their possible attainments is through the execution of peace-time maneuvers. In those maneuvers there must be carriers with both the opposing forces, and they must be serving in various capacities. * * * If we are to learn what may be done with the carriers in the way of carrying planes to act as scouts, as a striking force, and simultaneously in all the different aerial operations that have been conceived, we must have a reasonable number of airplane carriers—certainly more than those in hand—and we ought to have them as soon as possible, because on the demonstrated usefulness of the airplane carrier will depend to a very large extent the development of our naval policy.

He calls attention to the fact that the Washington treaty as affecting the United States and Great Britain fixed a definite standard of 135,000 tons for airplane carriers. In doing that it obviously set what was expected to be a reasonable minimum tonnage to be attained by those powers to meet an absolute requirement. In view of this statement, extracts from which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, it seems to me to be a mistake when we are about to build 15 cruisers that we should not build an adequate number of airplane carriers, and the amendment which I have sent to the desk provides for one carrier to be built in each of the three years covered by this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the extracts referred to by the Senator will be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The extracts are as follows:

[From the statement of Hon. Edward P. Warner, Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Aviation, before the House Committee on Naval Affairs, January 23, 1928]

* * * But as I see it the problem of the airplane carrier is a novel one, with some aspects peculiar to itself, which makes it particularly important that the construction of carriers should be expedited at the present time, and that we should proceed with the construction, not only of one airplane carrier but of several, with a maximum of rapidity. This is a problem which requires separate analysis because of the peculiar technical and tactical position that the airplane carrier occupies. There has already been a discussion of the possibility of establishing ratios connecting the desirable numbers and tonnage of the various type of naval craft, such as cruisers, submarines, destroyers, etc., required for each battleship. However, it may be for those ships the discussion of airplane carriers in terms of ratios with any other type seems to me at present to be quite impracticable, the carrier has to be judged for the present, in itself, and the requirement for carriers, as I see it, is absolutely and wholly noncompetitive—an absolute not a relative requirement. And that is for two reasons.

In the first place, there has been set a definite standard for airplane carriers to be built up by the powers participating in the treaty of Washington. That treaty limits the tonnage of airplane carriers of over 10,000 tons to a total of 135,000 tons for ourselves and for the British Empire, and in doing so it obviously set what was anticipated to be a reasonable minimum tonnage to be attained by those powers to meet an absolute requirement. A materially lower figure might have been established, had that been thought desirable at the time, without requiring any actual scrapping of ships.

The second reason, and it is far more important, is that in the study and development of carriers, with special reference to their tactical operation, the evolution of which in this country has just begun during the past two years or so, it is almost essential to operate with more than one unit, with more than two, in fact with several. A multiplication of units is absolutely necessary in order to get the maximum benefit from experience in maneuvers.

* * * The only chance for gaining experience with aircraft carriers which will give our naval officers and professional men a really extended and full knowledge of their possible attainments is through the execution of peace-time maneuvers. In those maneuvers there must be carriers with both the opposing forces, and they must be serving in various capacities. It does not serve for the broadest, or for any broad, study to have only one or two of the carriers, or even three or four, with the whole fleet. If we are to learn what may be done with the carriers in the way of carrying planes to act as scouts, as a striking force, and simultaneously in all the different aerial operations that have been conceived, we must have a reasonable number of airplane carriers, certainly more than those in hand, and we ought to have them as soon as possible, because on the demonstrated usefulness of the airplane carrier will depend to a very large extent the development of our naval policy.

Nobody knows just how far carriers can go in work that has to be done with the fleet by some type of ship in any case, or how far they can replace other types. Experience has been lacking. There is no way to find out except by acquiring that experience in the actual operation of ships at sea, and that by actually flying airplanes from and to the carriers. Within the past two and one-half years there has been an enormous development in the airplane. That development has gone on without interruption for many years previously as well, and is being continued. Within the last two and one-half years, however, the evolution of service types of aircraft of postwar design has been carried forward to the point where production orders have been placed for the building in considerable quantities for the service of one or more brand new designs of each type, such as fighting planes, bombing planes, patrol planes, etc. These designs have been developed entirely since the war and they far exceed in performance what was available either during the war or in the years immediately after, when service experience with airplanes with the fleet was first being gained. That is good, but the airplane alone can not show the way. It is necessary to have mobile bases, and a sufficient number of them, so that the airplanes may operate not merely from a carrier and back to that carrier but from and to and between a group of carriers, the group being considered as a whole with relation to the aggregate air forces that they support or base. That is just like the case of land bases, two bases being not twice but four or more times, as useful as one.

We have two airplane carriers going into service. I refer to the Saratoga and the Lexington. They are of large size and I think it is desirable that we should be in a position as soon as possible to try to parallel those two large carriers by not one merely, or even two, but several of those smaller carriers which now appear to us to be far more efficient and desirable for future construction. Several carriers of approximately the same capacity and performance are needed to work in cooperation, and it is better that we have several so that we may increase the variety of technical information gained.

* * * * * * *

We can not try out the things that are necessary unless we have carriers of a new size. And I say explicitly "carriers." If there were a special form of plural to signify several say three or more carriers, I would employ that special form.

I am left in no doubt of the advisability, without considering any competitive element at all, of studying the real importance of the place of aircraft and mobile aircraft bases in fleet tactics, and of the advisability of building carriers briskly to put ourselves in a position to gain some real experience on a large enough scale to guide our action in the future.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. BINGHAM. I think my time has expired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has two minutes remaining.

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator from Connecticut can answer in two minutes the question which I desire to ask. What is to be the cost of each of the proposed carriers?

Mr. BINGHAM. The cost of each one will be $19,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. What is the cost of the cruisers provided for by the bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. The cost of the cruisers provided for by this bill is $17,000,000 each. The carrier provided for in the bill is to cost $19,000,000. My amendment provides two more carriers each to that sum.

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator willing to substitute a carrier for a cruiser?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in the opinion of naval authorities who know far more about the question than I do the necessity for the 15 cruisers is equal to the necessity for the three airplane carriers.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, is he suggesting two carriers in addition to the 15 cruisers?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have suggested that each year while we are building five cruisers we build one airplane carrier.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us whether the proposed two additional carriers are recommended by the Navy and whether they have been estimated for?

Mr. BINGHAM. I stated, but the Senator probably did not hear me, that when the original plan for an increase in the Navy came up in the House a year ago the Navy, stating that it met the approval of the President and was not in conflict with his financial policy, requested 25 cruisers and five airplane carriers. The House reduced the cruisers by two-fifths and the airplane carriers by four-fifths. My amendment would merely bring the carriers up two-fifths of the original number recommended by the Navy.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HALE. Is there an amendment now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Which amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Idaho offers the following amendment:

Add a new section as follows:

"First. That the Congress favors a restatement and recodification of the rules of law governing the conduct of belligerents and neutrals in war at sea on the basis of the inviolability of private property thereon.

"Second. That such restatement and recodification should be brought about if practically possible prior to the meeting of the conference on the limitation of armaments in 1931."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] desires to be present when this amendment is passed upon, and I promised him that I would not call it up in his absence. I did not know that it had the position of the first amendment, and, if I may, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be passed over for the present because the Senator from Missouri is very anxious to be here when it is considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent proposal of the Senator from Idaho? The Chair hears none, and the amendment will be passed over temporarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. The clerk will state the first amendment to the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, have the committee amendments been agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments printed in the bill have been agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, if it is in order I ask that the amendment which I have sent to the desk may be submitted to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment to be considered is the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. McKELLAR. May it be read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause in section 1, pages 1 and 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to begin the construction of five light cruisers and one aircraft carrier according to the following program:

"(a) One light cruiser prior to January 1, 1930, and one light cruiser prior to January 1, 1931, and two light cruisers prior to January 1, 1932, and one light cruiser prior to January 1, 1933, to cost, including armor and armament, not to exceed $12,000,000 each.

"(b) One aircraft carrier prior to January 1, 1931, to cost, including armor and armament, not to exceed $19,000,000. If the construction of any vessel herein authorized to be undertaken is not undertaken in the calendar year provided herein, such construction may be undertaken in the next succeeding calendar year. At least two of the vessels, together with their main engines, armor, and armament, the construction and manufacture of which is authorized by this act, shall be manufactured in the Government navy yards, naval gun factories, naval ordnance plants, or arsenals of the United States: Provided, That the cost of such manufacture, including all materials and parts thereof, shall be no greater than if built in private yards or by private persons or corporations: And provided further, That contracts for any and all of said five cruisers shall be upon a competitive basis."

On page 2, strike out section 4 and insert the following:

"SEC. 4. (a) The President is authorized and requested to invite all the nations of the world to send representatives to an international conference to be held in Washington, D. C., on or before January 1, 1930, for the purpose of bringing about a further limitation of armaments. The President is authorized to appoint not exceeding five citizens of the United States who, in his judgment, are qualified to be representatives of the United States in such a conference. The President shall fix the compensation of such representatives and shall appoint and fix the compensation of such secretaries and other employees as may be needed. Pending the convening of any such conference, the President is authorized to take such steps as he may deem necessary and proper for such conference, and to that end and for that purpose may cooperate with any committee or commission acting by order of the League of Nations, or by order of any nation or organization, in preparing data, compiling statistics, and performing other functions in aid of the purpose of such conference.

"(b) The sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for expenses incurred under this section, including salaries in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, rent in the District of Columbia, printing and binding, transportation, subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), contract stenographic reporting services, official cards, and such expenses as may be actually and necessarily incurred by the Government of the United States by reason of such invitation in the observance of proper courtesies.

"(c) In the event of any international agreement for the further limitation of naval armaments, to which the United States is a signatory, the President is hereby authorized and empowered to suspend in whole or in part any of the naval construction authorized under this act and to cancel or modify any contract entered into for and on behalf of the United States under this act. If any such contract is canceled or modified, settlement of claims arising therefrom shall be made by the President upon a fair and equitable basis, as he may determine, out of any funds hereafter to be appropriated for that purpose; except that if the terms of such settlements are unsatisfactory to any claimant such claimant shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount awarded by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sums as added to such 75 per cent shall make up such amount as will be just compensation for such claims in the manner provided by paragraph 20 of section 24 and section 145 of the Judicial Code, as amended."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, while I sent the amendment to the desk to-day and desired that it should be deemed pending, I did not intend and have not asked that it should be taken up for consideration at this time. I ask that it be passed over temporarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I sent to the desk to have printed this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Mississippi offers the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause through the comma in line 5, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to undertake, prior to January 1, 1932, the construction of 15 light cruisers, to cost, including armor and armament, not to exceed $17,000,000 each, and one aircraft carrier, to cost, including armor and armament, not to exceed $19,000,000: Provided."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, this amendment does not affect the number of cruisers to be constructed. It merely carries out the general custom that has been followed by past Congresses in making authorizations for the construction of battleships and cruisers and naval armaments.

It will be recalled that in 1916, when the country—as was seen by everyone, including the President at that time—was nearing war, and the President made his appeal to the Congress and through his speeches to the country in the interest of preparedness, a bill was introduced and passed the Congress providing that the President could begin the construction of certain vessels at any time within three years. While the Democrats had control of Congress at that time, the bill was given unanimous support by Republicans. The wording of the statute passed in 1916 was that he should have until 1919 to begin construction.

Again in 1924, under the leadership of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], when we authorized the construction of eight cruisers, the President was given three years in which to begin their construction. So in every instance where there was a limitation—and only in those two instances have there been limitations—we have given the President at least three years in which to begin the construction.

You will note that this bill was passed in the House in March of last year. It carried with it a provision that the construction of five of these cruisers should be begun by June 30 of this year. Nothing was done with the bill in the Senate at that time. The great importance attached to it now was not emphasized at that time. It has not been until recently. We did not know until this debate started that we were just beginning to get into another great World War. We at least thought when the peace pact was ratified recently that we were sincere, that we were in earnest in promoting the cause of peace. We thought that we were setting some kind of an example for the nations of the world to subscribe themselves to this renunciation of war and pledge themselves to the peaceful solution of controversies.

At that time I expressed myself as hoping that the cruiser bill would not be brought up for consideration during this session of Congress; that I thought it in better taste to be considered at the extra session of Congress that is to be held; that I did not believe that it was good psychology to ratify the peace pact and at the same time pass the cruiser bill. To me it is inconsistent; it smacks of insincerity. The Senate, however, disagrees with me and with others about that, and so we have it before us. You may have the votes here to pass it; but it does seem to me that we shall not be working any injury to anybody nor to the country, nor shall we be delaying the preparation if we are to have another war by giving to the incoming President until January 1, 1932, to begin the construction of these ships.

In the meantime, if we can have a disarmament conference, if it can be successful, if the efforts of our representatives are availing—and we hope they will be availing, conceding that the other conference was a failure in part, let us hope that they can succeed in this one—if they can, then we can save that much for the taxpayers of the country and do no injury to this Government of ours. So I submit that as a weapon of diplomacy we should eliminate the time limitations that we have in this bill and give to the President until the 1st day of January, 1932—which will be after the close of the next disarmament conference—to begin the construction of these vessels.

If the President wants to begin the construction of 1, 2, or 3 of the cruisers now, then in the public interests he can do it. It will be left to him. As a Democrat I am perfectly willing to lodge with the President and the State Department the authority and the power to begin their construction. I take it that they will have the interest of the country at heart sufficiently that if we should be in any great danger from other nations they would begin the construction of these cruisers; so I can not see that we can work any injury to the country by adopting this amendment, and we might do some good. At least it is worth the effort.

I therefore submit, Mr. President, that the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator what is the effect of this amendment? Does it simply take out the time limit?

Mr. HARRISON. The amendment takes out the time limit that the construction of 5 of these cruisers shall be started before June 30, 1929, 5 before June 30, 1930, and 5 before June 30, 1931, and delegates to the President, as we have done in these other bills, as I have stated, the power to begin the construction of the 15 cruisers and the airplane carrier by January 1, 1932.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, this cruiser bill, so called, providing for the construction of 15 cruisers, could have and should have been enacted into law three weeks ago. The friends of the measure, however, have carried on a filibuster to include in it a time limit within which the cruisers should be laid down. They have insisted that 5 should be laid down within 4 months, 5 in 1930, and 5 in 1931, while the President and the President elect thought that the limitation should be stricken from the bill. It was not included in the original draft, nor asked for by the administration.

No intelligent reason has been offered here for its inclusion; none why there should be this lack of confidence upon the part of a Republican House and a Republican Senate in the present administration and the incoming administration.

I have listened to the perfervid orations in which the imminent peril of immediate war with the British Empire was disclosed unless the desire of the administration in this matter be thwarted. These speeches would have been more convincing had they not been made almost without exception by those Senators who signed the round robin to kill the treaty of Versailles and thus destroy the hope of the world for an effective bar against war. In fact, some of these speeches, if not all of them, were the same speeches, slightly changed, that they made when that treaty was pending for ratification in the Senate.

A casual visitor in the gallery would have thought that time had turned backward, and Woodrow Wilson was President, and the treaty of Versailles pending. They were the same speakers, the same arguments, and apparently the same purpose actuated them now as on that occasion. What has so completely destroyed their faith in the present and incoming administration would be enlightening if they would but make it clear.

Our authorization for the construction of these vessels, I think, is justified. No threat against any nation could be inferred from that action. However, I can conceive that the frantic effort, contrary to all previous legislation, to include a time limit might well cause a feeling of apprehension upon the part of other nations, particularly Great Britain, since she has so constantly been held up during this debate as our natural enemy. But possibly that great Empire realizes that certain men in the public life of America habitually seek publicity by twisting the lion's tail; and since no evil effects have flown therefrom for more than a hundred years, it can regard that as no serious threat. Certainly it should be considered no more seriously than the solemn assurance of the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Maine, when he declared that everyone who dared to hope for peace and expressed that hope would be disapproved by him. Just what punishment he intends to inflict upon them for repeating the Lord's Prayer he has not yet set out.

I am not disposed to be critical of all those—included among whom is a general here so covered and bedecked with medals that he rattles like a tin peddler as he walks, the most of which medals were acquired here, and awarded to him for his skill in balancing himself in a swivel chair in Washington while others laid down their lives on the battle fields of France—who told a group of women the other day that the only way to manifest your love for your country is to declare your willingness that your neighbor's son may die for it. All this outcry for war comes from those who sniffed the battle from afar, but that is no new development of human nature. In every war those who most loudly cry out for it are those who do not expect to participate in it.

All remember what shriek went up in 1918 from dollar-a-year men and others like them, safe on this side of the sea, because an armistice was signed with Germany before Berlin had been sacked. Among the most violent in their opposition to what they called a premature peace were those here and out of this Chamber who now rattle their imaginary swords and call for preparedness. They were heard for their much speaking in 1917 and 1918. They labored long and successfully to destroy the hope for peace in the breast of those who had offered to die to secure it. So, however irritating it may be, it is neither informative nor new to hear again this clamor for blood. They have performed their full duty when they have cried out for war, and if war came have abstained from participating therein.

I repeat, no one has given any reason why the time clause should be included in this bill. It can hardly be contended, I presume, that the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator BORAH, the President, Mr. Coolidge, and the President elect, Mr. Hoover, have not as much information touching our foreign relations as have the Members of the Senate and House who now tell us that the President can not be trusted to perform a duty that every President heretofore enjoyed; that is, to exercise some discretion in fixing the time when a building program for the Navy should be laid down. However, it seems to me that the whole performance is a sham battle, an academic discussion, and I should not be concerned with it at all were it not that there are other problems pressing for solution which will require large expenditures to bring them to a successful issue.

The condition of the farmers in America is too well known to require description. Ruin and bankruptcy have engulfed most of them. More than a million farm families are being driven from their homes each year as a result of economic conditions. The savings of a lifetime have been swept away, children denied adequate clothes, and an opportunity to acquire an education. Wives and mothers have been brought to want. To alleviate this condition large expenditures will be required upon the part of the Government.

Twenty millions of farmers for eight years have looked to Congress for help, and have looked in vain. Shall they be again denied justice because the shipyards can not wait for the larger profits that are to accrue to them from the immediate building of these cruisers? Shall they be denied relief from pressing want, while the money that could have brought them help is tied up in the building, the immediate building, of these battle cruisers?

Again, there is a valley that stretches a thousand miles, from Cairo to the Gulf, of an average breadth of 150 miles, throughout the whole length and breadth of which a mighty flood swept in 1927. It brought in its wake the destruction of a billion dollars' worth of property and the loss of hundreds of lives. It rendered insecure the homes of all the people who lived within that area. The fear of a repetition of that disaster hangs like a pall over the people who dwell in that valley.

They thought they had been promised protection from a recurrence of this flood. To fulfill that promise will require the expenditure of many millions of dollars from the Federal Treasury. And let all of us be advised, because everyone realizes that if we shall not strike the time limit from this bill, the farmers of America must wait and wait long for relief, and the dwellers in the Mississippi Valley will be required to wait and wait weary years for the fulfillment of that promise to guard them against recurring floods.

We are required to-day, therefore, to choose which interest we will save, and having chosen, we and they will have to abide that choice.

For myself, I believe in adequate protection. I believe that our shores should be made secure and our commerce upon the seas permitted to seek its markets unafraid. I know that condition now exists, and I know we will protect our homes and our commerce whether the time limit be included or stricken from this bill. Therefore, I know that the accomplishment of this is not the moving spirit that compels some so doggedly to contend that the time limit should be included in this bill. They have refrained from disclosing that motive. Why?

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I hope that the amendment offered to the pending bill by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] will not prevail. If there is any inconsistency between our signing the Kellogg peace pact and then proceeding to pass that bill, it is an inconsistency that will be shared with us by every civilized power on the globe.

Great Britain, in the very act of making a great addition to her cruisers, to which I have no particular objection, will sign the Kellogg peace pact. So will France, while maintaining her great army. So will Italy, while increasing her navy and maintaining her great army. And so with every other civilized power, while providently keeping up her national defenses. The Kellogg peace pact will not have the immediate effect of reducing a solitary army in the world to the extent of a single soldier, or a solitary navy in the world to the extent of a single ship. So I say that if any good reason is to be assigned why the pending bill should not be passed with its time limit, it must be some other reason than that which has been given by the Senator from Mississippi.

I think that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] does not a little injustice to the Senate when he speaks of the discussion of the pending bill as having been conspicuously marked by hostility to Great Britain. On the whole, I believe that the debate has been conducted with an extraordinary measure of generous feeling toward her. I, for one, took early occasion to say that my attitude toward the pending bill would not be in the slightest degree governed by unfriendliness toward Great Britain, because, next to my own country, there was no country in the world for which I entertained such a profound feeling of attachment as I did for Great Britain. What I said on that subject was simply in keeping with almost everything, with a few exceptions, that has been said in the course of the debate with respect to Great Britain.

I also disclaim, and I think that I can not only make the disclaimer for myself but for many of my associates in this Chamber, any desire to match ship with ship or gun with gun with Great Britain.

Under existing conditions I think that she is doing the wise thing in building up her fleet as she is doing. Her commerce vexes every sea, her power extends over the whole world, and, as I said the other day, wherever her flag goes, law and order, human liberty, and human civilization in all its higher forms go. It is my personal belief that if her Government ever wished to build up a fleet in excess of her real needs for protection the British taxpayer would not allow it to do so any more than the American taxpayer would allow our Government to build up a fleet in excess of our real needs.

Just as an individual householder who does not insure his house against fire should be set down as a stark fool, so should any nation which does not make adequate military and naval provision for its security.

It so happens that the commerce of Great Britain is of very much the same volume as ours. I am speaking of foreign commerce; we have, of course, in addition to our enormous foreign commerce a great coastal commerce. In supporting the proposed increase of cruisers I am not doing so because I am disposed to enter upon a race of naval competition with Great Britain, but because I know of no better standard of prudence for us to adopt than that adopted by such an experienced, wise, and peace-loving country as Great Britain for her safety. In my opinion, when we advocate the passage of the pending bill and vote for it, no one has a right to say that we do so because we are actuated by fear of war with Great Britain.

It is perfectly evident, so far as the Senator from Arkansas is concerned, that he is influenced much more by regional considerations, in his relations toward this bill, than by any considerations coextensive with our entire national territory. What he is really afraid of is that so much money may be required for the construction of the cruisers provided for in the pending bill that there may not be enough left for the plan of relief for the sufferers in the Mississippi Valley that was inaugurated last spring, and in which he is, naturally, much interested. I am not finding fault with him because he responds to those local considerations, but I do think that they ought to make him just a little more considerate than he was in making proper allowance for the motives by which his associates in this Chamber, who feel as I do about the pending bill, are swayed.

I shall vote for the pending bill, if for no other reason, because I think that the time has come in the history of this country when its military spirit is in danger of being enervated to a deadly extent by the pacifist spirit that the bill has elicited. We all recall the period immediately prior to our entrance into the World War when, before we could get down to our stern task, we had to brush aside a "lunatic fringe," to use Theodore Roosevelt's phrase, of conscientious objectors and other pacifists of one sort or another. It was not until we had cleared our decks of traitors and demitraitors, conscientious objectors, slackers, and pacifists of every description, that we found ourselves in a position to bring to our allies the degree of aid that they had a right to expect from us. And yet, now, 10 years after the World War, the most fearful catastrophe which humanity has ever known, we are faced by the same host of visionaries and whatnot. Day after day they have haunted the corridors of this Capitol, doing all that they could to paralyze the arm of national defense.

I have classified the opponents of the pending bill who have descended upon me and protested against its passage. Some of them were Quakers, and for that worthy body of men I have but little criticism, because for generations the Quaker has been opposed to war in every form, though at times his whims about war have had to yield to some extent to the remorseless laws that govern human existence.

Other remonstrants were clerical literalists. One member of a large delegation that came here from Maryland the other day, a clergyman, said that I should vote against the pending bill because the Scriptures say that—

> They that take the sword shall perish with the sword.

I knew something about the probable convictions of that man in other directions, so I said, "I see you are a clerical literalist, and that you think that I should be bound by a strict interpretation of that scriptural statement. Do you feel bound by the indulgent view of wine, which caused our Lord miraculously to convert six waterpots of water into wine?" Of course, that floored my clerical friend. An amiable lady came to his aid and said that the conversion was not into wine but some other kind of liquid.

Other remonstrants who have approached me belonged to the radical or semirevolutionary elements in our population, who are opposed to any increase in our military or naval armaments because they are looking forward to the time when they may have an opportunity to carry their subversive social theories or aims of one sort or another into execution by force.

One of the most active persons of this sort who has approached me was an individual who was especially conspicuous in insisting on the innocence of Sacco and Vanzetti, the socialistic malefactors, after they had been adjudged guilty by a judge, a jury, and a committee composed of some of the most eminent citizens of our land.

I say it is high time now that we should make short shift of all these enemies of the pending bill. If we heed their counsels, then indeed, in the language of Shakespeare, there is danger that the steel in our hands will become as soft as the parasite's silk, and that when the dread hour of appalling peril for our country arrives there will not be enough robust manliness within its limits to meet it as it should be met.

Everyone in this body, I think, knows what my ideas about world peace are. Along with adequate naval and military armaments for the protection of our country should go, in my judgment, the assumption by it of a larger share of world responsibility for world peace than it has yet had the courage to assume. Blame England for increasing the number of her cruisers? No. Did not Lloyd George say, during Wilson's time, that England would never accept the freedom of the seas unless and until the League of Nations had been established and had become a reality? I echo his sentiments in my relations to my own country. Not until we assume our full share of world responsibility for world peace, not until our country is a part of the League of Nations, not until our country is a part of the World Court, not until general disarmament on sea and land under the auspices of the League of Nations has become a reality, shall I ever consent that our naval or our military armaments shall fall below the level that is requisite for our safety as a people.

In conclusion, I wish likewise to say that I for one reject as cant a large part of what has been said in the course of this debate about war. War is not always an abominable and tragic thing. Wars of aggression, wars of ambition, wars of territorial lust are, and the first duty of the civilized world at the present time is to keep such wars in check. But I say, and I should be recreant to all that is most laudable in the history of the United States, if I did not say, that there is such a thing as a righteous war, such a thing as a noble war, such a thing as a glorious war—nay, such a thing even as a holy war. When home and hearthstone are invaded by a foreign foe, when human liberty is at stake, and everything that man should hold most precious is hanging in the balance, then it is my belief that God lays aside for a moment His character of the God of mercy and in His character as the God of Hosts, looks down with approval upon such a war. When any other belief than that is cherished there is real peril to the character of our people and a real menace to their ability to meet one of those great military crises which befall every people.

I trust that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi and every other dilatory amendment of the same nature to the pending bill will be defeated. The Senator from Mississippi, like a good lawyer, knows that when the odds are against him, the one thing to which he can resort as a sound strategical move is procrastination. All he is fighting for is procrastination. He is hoping that the life will ebb out of the proposal to construct the cruisers provided for in the pending bill if their construction can only be put off long enough.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I hope very much the Senate will not adopt the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi. I can see in his amendment no improvement whatever on the provisions of the bill. It is a time limitation, but not as workable a one as is provided in the bill which I am sure the Senate will approve.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I had asked that the amendment in which I was interested should go over until the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] could be here. He is here now and I would be glad if we could dispose of it. There are several other speeches to be made on the other amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, are we not ready to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SWANSON. I much prefer to have it disposed of first.

Mr. JOHNSON. May we not proceed with that matter, I ask the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I have not any means of preventing it, if the Senate is not ready to take action on my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Harrison amendment has been discussed.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think the Senate is about ready to vote on the Harrison amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I insist that the Harrison amendment shall be disposed of, but I wish to say there is a misconception that under the bill as reported the cruisers must be constructed and completed within three years. The bill simply provides that their construction must be undertaken. It would be seven years before the program could be completed under the bill as it is now before the Senate. If the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi should be agreed to, it would probably be 10 years before they could be completed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, let us have the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this is an amendment which, if agreed to, will carry out, at least in the main, the wishes of President Coolidge. It is, at least to a great extent, an amendment which will take the limitation out of the bill. It is asked for by our President. I am surprised, Mr. President, that there are so many Senators who have always been so willing to obey the master's voice, who have for the last seven years lived in luxury on the political pie that has come from a lavish hand, that they should now refuse longer to follow his wishes. Now, when he is about to pass from office, when he is about to be shorn of his Samson locks, when he is about to surrender the party whip before whose crack we have so often bowed in humble submission——

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what particular Delilah is engaged in shearing the locks of the President?

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, at this time, when he is about to surrender the key to inclosure where the plum tree grows, where we face the last opportunity almost that we have to follow him, it seems to me that it is hardly proper, hardly just, that we should turn our backs upon him. I am thankful that I am still faithful. [Laughter.] Notwithstanding the fact that the political pie counter is swept clean, notwithstanding the fact that the political cupboard is as empty as that one of ancient times presided over by the famous Mother Hubbard, I am thankful that I am still following my leader. [Laughter.]

But oh, you ungrateful Senators, you men who have so often profited on account of the kindness of your leader, now, when he is about to pass out of public life, are you going to turn your backs upon him and refuse longer to obey?

> O you hard hearts, you cruel Senators of party,
> Knew you not Calvin? Many a time and oft
> Have you climb'd up to walls and battlements,
> To towers and windows, yea, to chimney tops,
> Your infants in your arms, and there have sat
> The live-long day with patient expectation
> To see great Calvin pass the public streets:
> And when you saw his chariot but appear,
> Have you not made an universal shout,
> That the river trembled underneath her banks
> To hear the replication of your sounds
> Made in her concave shores?
> And do you now put on your best attire?
> And do you now cull out a holiday?
> And do you now strew flowers in his way
> That comes in triumph after Calvin's term?
> Run to your houses, fall upon your knees,
> Pray to the gods to intermit the plague
> That needs must light on such ingratitude.

[Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Strike out all after the enacting clause through the comma in line 5, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

> That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to undertake prior to January 1, 1932, the construction of 15 light cruisers, to cost, including armor and armament, not to exceed $17,000,000 each, and 1 aircraft carrier, to cost, including armor and armament, not to exceed $19,000,000: Provided.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is ill and unable to be here. If he were present, I am told, he would vote "nay," and if I were permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is detained from the Senate on account of illness, and I ask that this announcement be included in each roll call.

Mr. BRATTON (when Mr. LARRAZOLO's name was called). My colleague the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. LARRAZOLO] is absent from the Chamber on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. MCKELLAR (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who is absent on account of illness. I transfer my pair with him to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BINGHAM (when Mr. METCALF's name was called). The junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] is detained at home on account of illness. He has been unable to secure a pair. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] left the Chamber a few minutes ago, owing to sudden illness. In view of that fact, I have agreed to pair with him. If the Senator from Florida were here, he would vote "nay," and if I were permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. EDGE. Has the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. EDGE. If the junior Senator from New Jersey were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. RANSDELL. My colleague the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] is absent on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 54, as follows:

So Mr. HARRISON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. BORAH. Is the amendment the Senator now proposes on the same subject?

Mr. HARRISON. It is on the same subject.

Mr. HALE. Was the amendment offered before 4 o'clock?

Mr. HARRISON. The amendment was offered before 4 o'clock this afternoon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment was offered before 4 o'clock, and will now be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 4, it is proposed to strike out "July 1, 1931" and to insert in lieu thereof "January 1, 1932"; on the same page, line 8, to strike out "June 30, 1931" and to insert "January 1, 1930"; in the same line, to strike out the figures "1930" and to insert "1931," and also to strike out "1931" and to insert "1932."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the object of that amendment is this: Under the pending bill, as Senators know, 5 cruisers are to be laid down before June 30, of this year, 5 by June 30, 1930, and 5 by June 30, 1931. I propose to change those dates in view of the fact that when the bill passed the other House in March last year evidently its proponents at that time thought that construction might be begun within something over a year, because they provided that the first five cruisers might be built during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929. I have changed the dates so that 5 of them shall be started by January 1, 1930, 5 by January 1, 1931, and 5 by January 1, 1932.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi if, by his amendment, he is not seeking now to include a time limit, and if it is not inconsistent with his other amendment, and, therefore, open to the same objection which was urged to the original time limit included in the bill?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there is much in the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, but if this amendment should be adopted, as the disarmament conference will meet in 1931, at least five of these cruisers will not have been started by that time under the amendment. Under the bill as it now stands before the conference is held all of them will have been already started.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] being now present, I desire to call up the amendment which was reached a few moments ago and which has heretofore been offered by me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

> First. That the Congress favors a restatement and recodification of the rules of law governing the conduct of belligerents and neutrals in war at sea on the basis of the inviolability of private property thereon.
> Second. That such restatement and recodification should be brought about if practically possible prior to the meeting of the conference on the limitation of armaments in 1931.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment which has just been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho, it is proposed to insert the following:

First. That the Congress favors a treaty, or treaties, with all the principal maritime nations regulating the conduct of belligerents and neutrals in war at sea, including the inviolability of private property thereon and embracing as nearly as practicable the principles set forth in article 12 of the treaty of 1785 negotiated between the United States and Prussia, in which negotiations Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and John Adams represented the United States.

Second. That such treaties be negotiated if practically possible prior to the meeting of the conference on the limitation of armaments in 1931.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, are we proceeding under the 10-minute rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. We are.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator from Missouri?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I think we are unfamiliar with the substitute just read; and it has not been printed, as I understand. Has it been printed?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Not in the present form.

Mr. NORRIS. This is a very important substitute. We can not finish the consideration of the bill to-night anyway; and I wonder if the Senator from Kansas will agree to take a recess until to-morrow?

Mr. CURTIS. There is a time limit on debate, and I think we ought to take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I should like very much to complete the bill to-night. The Senate is here now almost to a man, and I should like very much to get the bill through.

RECESS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Before putting the question on the motion, the Chair, under the order heretofore entered, refers to the appropriate committees sundry messages received to-day from the President of the United States. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 5, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, February 4, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Great and marvelous are Thy works, Lord God Almighty, just and holy are Thy ways. Behind all are intelligence and will which sway an unseen scepter; help us to believe that the power is personal. Let the chant of creation become the song of redemption. In the gladness of this faith, O God, keep us and direct us. In all the works of Thy hands may we behold Thee and see the blessed smile of our Father in Heaven. We thank Thee for that love that always finds its way. Many waters can not quench it, floods can not drown it, and time can never change it. Thou who hast laid upon the altar of the world's need the best wisdom and the divinest love, minister unto our sorrowing Member as he bears the weight of a loss which all the world can not replace. Sustain him with the light that never fails and with the strength that never breaks. All through the Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and concurrent resolution of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 10774. An act for the relief of the Carlisle Commission Co.; and

H. Con. Res. 48. Concurrent resolution to provide for the printing of 2,500 copies of the consolidated hearings on "Tariff readjustment, 1929."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 5350. An act to amend the air commerce act of 1926 with reference to the examination and rating of schools giving instruction in flying; and

S. 5578. An act recognizing the heroic conduct, devotion to duty, and skill on the part of the officers and crew of the U. S. S. America, and for other services.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2366) entitled "An act to amend subchapter 1 of chapter 18 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia relating to degree-conferring institutions," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. BLAINE, Mr. HASTINGS, and Mr. COPELAND to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. REED of Pennsylvania and Mr. FLETCHER members of the joint select committee provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the War Department.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 16301) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. JONES, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. GLASS to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

HAWESVILLE & CANNELTON BRIDGE CO.

Mr. GARDNER of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, on January 24, 1929, I introduced H. R. 16565, a bill authorizing the Hawesville & Cannelton Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Cannelton, Ind., in the district I represent.

On January 28, 1929, I answered certain questions in regard to the proposed bridge as asked me by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. For the information of the House I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting my letter to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in regard to this matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1929.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Hon. JAMES B. PARKER, Chairman.

In re: H. R. 16565.

GENTLEMEN: I have your letter of January 25 in regard to H. R. 16565, a bill authorizing the Hawesville & Cannelton Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Cannelton, Ind.

In answer to your questions 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5:

1. Q. Is there a ferry now in operation at or near the proposed location of the bridge upon which tolls are charged for crossing the river?—A. There is now a ferry being operated between Cannelton and Hawesville on which tolls are charged for crossing the river. This ferry is doing an ever-increasing business.

2. Q. Are the people in the vicinity of the proposed bridge desirous of having a toll bridge constructed at that place?—A. Yes; they are strongly urging the construction of such a bridge.

3. Q. Is there manifest any considerable public sentiment in favor of the construction of such a bridge?—A. I have in my possession resolutions adopted in favor of the construction of said bridge setting forth the benefit to be derived, and the advantages of the erection of a bridge at this location, and the favorable topographical conditions, narrowness of the river, ideal conditions for approaches, and the shallow depth necessary to reach solid-rock foundation, and stating that a bridge can be built between Hawesville, Ky., and Cannelton, Ind., at a lower cost than at any other point on the Ohio River having the same traffic possibilities. These resolutions are signed by public officials and leading citizens of Perry County, Ind., in which Cannelton is located, and by public officials and leading citizens of Hancock County, Ky., in which Hawesville is located. And I know of no objection to the erection of said bridge.

4. Q. Is the State or county or municipality in which the bridge is to be located in a financial condition to finance and construct a free bridge at that location?—A. No; I do not believe the States, nor the counties, nor the municipalities in which the bridge is to be located are in a financial condition to finance the construction of a bridge now or in the near future.

5. Q. In your judgment, is there a probability that the State or county or municipality will, in the near future, construct a free bridge at that location?—A. I do not think that there is a possibility of a bridge being built at this location at this time, nor at any time in the near future, by the States or counties or municipalities in which the bridge is proposed to be located, nor at any point near this location. The only opportunity for these people to secure the benefit of a bridge is by constructing one in the manner that the Hawesville & Cannelton Bridge Co. have undertaken, and as provided for in this bill. I have gone into this matter thoroughly, and I am satisfied that there is no opportunity for the people who are interested in this proposed bridge to get a bridge constructed in any way other than the way proposed by the Hawesville & Cannelton Bridge Co. and as is provided for in this bill. This bridge if erected would be a wonderful help to the people of the district I represent in Indiana and to the people of the district in Kentucky in which Hawesville is located, represented by Hon. DAVID H. KINCHELOE, and would be beneficial to the highway system.

Cannelton is the county seat of Perry County, Ind., and the southern termini of State Roads No. 37 and No. 64 in Indiana and is only 28 miles from State Road No. 62. Hawesville is the county seat of Hancock County, Ky., and is on Federal highway No. 60, and this bridge would form a connecting link between the State and Federal highways of Kentucky and the State and Federal highways of Indiana.

About 90 per cent of the mail, express, and passenger service to and from Cannelton, Tell City, and Troy, Ind., is by way of Hawesville, Ky., and the Louisville, Henderson & St. Louis Railway.

The ferry service is now very inadequate for this service, and especially is this true in the winter when there is ice in the river and during times of high water.

There is now no bridge spanning the Ohio River up the river between this point and Louisville, Ky., and no bridge spanning the Ohio River down the river between this point and Evansville, Ind.

The erection of a bridge at this location would be very helpful, not only to a deserving people in the locality in which the proposed bridge is to be erected but to the general traveling public, and it is very desirous that permission be given at this session of Congress for the construction of this bridge. I therefore earnestly request that this committee give early and favorable action on this bill.

Respectfully submitted.

[H. R. 16565, 70th Cong., 2d sess.]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 24, 1929.

Mr. GARDNER of Indiana introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 16565) authorizing the Hawesville & Cannelton Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Cannelton, Ind.

Be it enacted, etc., that in order to facilitate interstate commerce, improve the postal service, and provide for military and other purposes, Hawesville & Cannelton Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, be and are hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Ohio River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Cannelton, Perry County, Ind., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon Hawesville & Cannelton Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, all such rights and power to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said Hawesville & Cannelton Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, are hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of Indiana, the State of Kentucky, any public agency or political subdivision of either of such States, within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of either of such States governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of 10 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion costs, not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interests in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 5. If such bridge shall be taken over or acquired by the States or public agencies or political subdivisions thereof, or by either of them as provided in section 4 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 6. Hawesville & Cannelton Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall, within 90 days after the completion of such bridge, file with the Secretary of War and with the Highway Departments of the States of Indiana and Kentucky a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, and upon request of the highway department of either of such States shall, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge; for the purpose of such investigation the said Hawesville & Cannelton Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 4 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 7. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to Hawesville & Cannelton Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 8. All contracts made in connection with the construction of the bridge authorized by this act and which shall involve the expenditure of more than $5,000 shall be let by competitive bidding. Such contracts shall be advertised for a reasonable time in some newspaper of general circulation published in the States in which the bridge is located and in the vicinity thereof; sealed bids shall be required and the contracts shall be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder. Verified copies or abstracts of all bids received and of the bid or bids accepted shall be promptly furnished to the highway departments of the States in which such bridge is located. A failure to comply in good faith with the provisions of this section shall render null and void any contract made in violation thereof, and the Secretary of War may, after hearings, order the suspension of all work upon such bridge until the provisions of this section shall have been fully complied with.

SEC. 9. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

COAST GUARD STATION, QUILLAYUTE RIVER

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 14151 and agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 14151 and agree to the Senate amendment. The Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14151) to provide for establishment of a Coast Guard station at or near the mouth of the Quillayute River in the State of Washington.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, which I shall not do, when the bill was before the House I asked why that language was stricken out which has now been restored by the Senate.

Mr. HOCH. I may say that I looked up the basic law, and I am satisfied that the amendment is not at all necessary, but the Senate has put it in and there is no objection to it.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is no reason for putting it back in?

Mr. HOCH. The committee considered it surplusage and I still consider it surplusage.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman consulted the ranking minority member of the committee?

Mr. HOCH. I have.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

ADDRESS OF HON. CONRAD G. SELVIG

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a radio address by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SELVIG], delivered at Washington, D. C., February 2, 1929, on "A Better Day for Agriculture."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SELVIG] delivered at Washington, D. C., February 2, 1929:

A BETTER DAY FOR AGRICULTURE

It is a great pleasure for me to speak to this far-flung radio audience this evening.

The farmers of the United States look forward to the coming season with hope. In this they are justified. They have every reason to believe that the American Nation will fulfill the pledges made in behalf of our rural population.

A challenge has aroused America. It is the challenge of an unsolved problem. It is the challenge to place agriculture upon a plane of economic equality, to bring more satisfaction to our farmers, to make more smooth the path of the tillers of the soil.

It has taken long years to bring our people to a realization of its responsibility to our farmers and to bring home the accepted fact that the welfare of our Nation demands that we safeguard our agriculture. Not to do this would be the height of folly.

George Washington, in a letter to the Marquis de Lafayette, written at Mount Vernon January 29, 1789, emphasized the transcending importance of agriculture and extolled its handmaid—industry. In this letter he expresses his conviction that both should go forward together, that industry should be encouraged, but with "no diminution in agriculture" and "not to the prejudice of agriculture."

In this letter he displayed the rare statesmanship that always characterized his views. Modern-day statesmen, grappling with the acute agricultural problems that were left us as a heritage of the World War, can well take note of his words.

In his address to both Houses of Congress, January 8, 1790, George Washington said:

"The advancement of agriculture [which he placed first], commerce, and manufactures, by all proper means, will not, I trust, need recommendation."

There is a suggestion in Washington's words that should be heeded in the United States to-day. To provide equal opportunity for the farmer is one of the great tasks that confront present-day statesmanship.

Nearly 60 years ago Abraham Lincoln made a statement in which there is a prophetic note. He said:

"It also follows that that interest [referring to agriculture] is most worthy of all to be cherished and cultivated; that if there be inevitable conflict between that interest and any other, the other should yield."

These words are as true to-day. The American farmer must be given equal opportunity, an equal chance. He does not ask for more. The Nation can not afford to give him less.

In the year 1928 the people of the United States participated in a nation-wide referendum of the farm question. Citizens from every section took part. A conclusion was reached. It was that something be done; that constructive action be taken.

FARM TARIFF REVISION

A beginning has already been made. A special session of Congress will be held. During that session will be undertaken tariff revision in the interests of agriculture. The openly avowed purpose of the proposed tariff adjustments, I take it, is for the benefit of the farmers. This is the understanding, also, of millions of farmers in our land. Through tariff revision the farmers are to be given more fully their own domestic market for the products of their labor, freed from foreign importations of competitive agricultural products.

The farmers are in earnest about this. The testimony presented before the Ways and Means Committee last week gave ample evidence of their faith and sincerity.

The tariff requests made by the farmers were scientifically and forcefully presented. From east, north, south, and west the farmers' spokesmen were practically unanimous regarding necessary tariff adjustments. Agriculture stood united.

The farmers, for the first time in history, spoke in a single voice in their own behalf. There was no criticism of any other group. There was no opposition voiced against any other industry. The farmers simply presented the tariff needs for agriculture, that was all.

This is good news to all engaged in farming the country over. Look back to the year 1922, when the hearings were held on the present tariff act, and note the contrast. The difference is highly significant. In 1922 food processors, importers, manufacturers, wholesalers, storage and commission firms, and the middlemen, did nearly all of the testifying. The farmers themselves were not conspicuous at those hearings.

We were too near the close of the war period at that time for agriculture to have formulated a tariff policy. This year it is different. Research bureaus have secured the facts and expert economists employed by the farmers themselves have compiled the evidence for presentation to the public. The farmers have learned during the past seven years how to make their voice potent in legislative halls. They know that mere opinions have little weight with the legislators. They know that hard, cold facts and undisputed evidence must be given. I rejoice with the farmers of America in the accomplishment of this important step.

THE BATTLE NOT YET WON

None must be deluded, however, by thinking that the mere presentation of requests before a committee is sufficient in and of itself to win the case. The farmers must be persistent in their endeavors, not only to secure adequate tariff duties on competitive agricultural products and by-products, but to resist any plan to skyrocket the industrial tariff rates.

I am sure that the farmers want to be fair in this matter. I am equally certain that there is no disposition nor intention on the part of the Congress to hand the farmers a legislative gold brick. The welfare of both industrial and agricultural groups is so intimately intertwined and interrelated that they go up or down together.

In order to keep the record straight, however, I desire to submit that in the present tariff act, which it is now proposed to revise, the manufactured commodities now enjoy a much higher rate of protection than do most of our agricultural products.

PRESENT TARIFF ACT ANALYZED

Figures from official sources tell the story. The average ad valorem rate given manufactured products, the so-called industrial commodities, in the 1922 tariff act is approximately 40 per cent. The average ad valorem rate given agricultural products is approximately 22 per cent. Let me cite the average ad valorem rates of the following classes of manufactured goods:

Schedule (1927)—Average ad valorem rate of duty to values of dutiable merchandise, unweighted

	Per cent
Chemicals, oils, and paints	28
Earths, earthenware, and glassware	48
Metals and manufactures of	35
Silk and silk goods	56
Sundries	39
Cotton manufactures	36
Average duty on above 6 schedules	40

The average is 40 per cent.

Now let us turn to a few of the agricultural schedules:

Commodity (1927)—Equivalent ad valorem, unweighted

	Per cent
Sheep	25
Swine	4
Butter	35
Poultry, dead	22
Corn	19
Wheat	33
Oranges	18
Flaxseed	23
Peas, green	20
Potatoes	30
Average duty on imported agricultural products, excluding free list	22

The average is 22 per cent.

Bear in mind, too, that not all of the agricultural tariff rates in the present tariff act are effective. This still further widens the gap that exists between the tariff protection actually given agricultural products in comparison with nonagricultural commodities.

FARMERS DEMAND PARITY

The farmers now demand that they be placed on a parity with industry from the standpoint of tariff benefits. The farmer knows that he will gain little or nothing from increased tariff protection on farm products if on the other hand his farming expenses and cost of living are unduly increased.

To put it bluntly and plainly, tariff parity as between agriculture and industry can only be secured by leaving industry with substantially its present tariff rates and increasing the duty on agricultural products up to the level now enjoyed by industry.

Perhaps there are a few industrial schedules that should be increased. Doubtless there are also import duties which should be lowered. This should be done if the tariff protection afforded any industry has made possible monopolistic control, and this has been followed by unduly enhanced prices.

In determining whether the tariff rates on manufactures should be raised, a study should be made of the price level of industrial stocks during the past few years to ascertain definitely which industries are barely struggling along on account of disastrous foreign competition. This survey would develop whether there is any industry in our country to-day so poor as is agriculture.

Christmas-time bonuses might be investigated, in order to throw light upon the financial conditions of the industries and corporations now seeking higher protection. Stock dividends should be gone into. The ratio between actual and capitalized value of the manufacturing plants might throw some light on the problem.

I am convinced that the members of the committee are determined to seek out all the information which will assist them in reporting a bill with tariff rates that will be fair and equitable both to agriculture and to industry.

The responsibility of the farmers themselves did not cease when their spokesmen submitted the tariff rates wanted. That is too much like expecting a resolution adopted at a mass meeting to result in a miracle.

A careful study will have to be made of all the tariff increases requested. The interests of labor, of consumers in both urban and rural areas, of producers, be they manufacturers or farmers, must be considered.

I can see definite benefits come to the farmers of the United States if protective rates are granted. Consumers will not be penalized if this Nation adopts and carries through the policy of encouraging and expanding domestic production on a basis that gives our farmers a chance to live according to the American standard.

Consumers need have no fears. Six and one-half million producing units, which is approximately the number of farms in the United States, will assure our consuming public ample and well-stocked larders. It is equally certain that the farmers can have no desire to harm industry. The people living in the industrial centers are the farmers' best buyers. The interests of both groups must be safeguarded.

FEDERAL FARM BOARD

In addition to farm tariff adjustments, the special session of Congress will consider the so-called farm-relief legislation as well. This is an urgent problem. It centers around the establishment of a Federal farm board which will be intrusted with the tremendous task of seeking to improve our farm marketing system.

1. A fundamental task assigned this board will be to prevent seasonal market gluts to depress unduly the market. The solution will probably run in the direction of assisting the producers themselves to stabilize the flow to market of their products at a price that includes the cost of efficient production plus a reasonable profit.

2. Such a Federal farm board would give some attention to the attempt to adjust production to probable consumptive demands. This task will be less difficult if and when a proper farm tariff is secured, because this same tariff, if properly framed, will aid in controlling our surplus. We import our surplus at the present time. We do not produce it. Imports of competitive agricultural products annually displace the production of nearly 70,000,000 acres. Tariff adjustments can assist in diverting production from the so-called export products to products which are on a domestic competitive basis.

3. The Federal farm board will also have to be given authority to handle any exportable surplus in a manner that will permit the domestic producer to secure the tariff benefit and to have it reflected in the price that he receives.

One of three courses must be followed in dealing with this problem: Either (a) the producers must curtail production to the domestic basis; or (b) there must be imposed an equalization fee on the entire production to finance the losses on the part sold abroad; or (c) there must be provided an export premium on the part sold in the foreign market. As I said before, our tariff policy can be of great help in dealing with this problem.

4. The proposed Federal farm board will also be of great assistance in eliminating unnecessary middlemen services, and speculative profit-takers in the marketing process.

A stupendous task confronts Congress in shaping the so-called farm relief legislative program. There is no intention to dodge this responsibility.

OTHER MEASURES

The entire farm problem, however, is not solely wrapped up with the farm tariff and a Federal farm board. It is not so simple as that.

1. Fundamentally, efficient production is at the foundation of a successful agriculture. This means securing maximum yields at a minimum of cost, in line with the American standard of living. Nothing can take the place of efficient production which includes the increased use of farm machinery, of labor-saving devices of all kinds, and which looks forward to the utilization of farm power, of fertilizers, of pure-bred sires, of cow-testing associations, of better seed and of following the most approved farm practices. These are fundamental aspects. Nothing can be substituted which will make inefficient production profitable.

2. Research in agriculture is required. The utilization by industry of waste products of the farm is in special need of investigation. Augmented farm extension services are needed. Organized farm groups have never before had such an unusual opportunity for service as now. Self-improvement programs for and by individuals themselves are indispensable. A modern, forward-looking rural education policy is essential.

3. The farmers need a more equitable system of taxation.

4. The farmer needs credit on terms comparable with rates given other groups.

5. The farmer needs lower freight costs. The continued development of inland waterways is necessary. The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep-sea waterway must be constructed.

The entire evening could be spent in enlarging upon these matters, but time does not permit.

I said at the outset that the farmers of the United States look forward to the coming season with hope. In this they are justified. I believe 1929 will be an epochal one for agriculture.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 5578 and consider the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 5578 and consider the same. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

S. 5578, Seventieth Congress, second session

An act (S. 5578) recognizing the heroic conduct, devotion to duty, and skill on the part of the officers and crew of the U. S. S. America, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the term "crew" as used in this act shall mean and include any person carried on the ship's register or serving on the ship in any capacity, regardless of rank or rating, at the time of the rescue referred to in this act.

SEC. 2. That the thanks and appreciation of the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, tendered to the officers and crew of the U. S. The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the Consent Calendar.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT BATON ROUGE

The first business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 2449) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Baton Rouge, in the parish of East Baton Rouge, and a point opposite thereto in the parish of West Baton Rouge, State of Louisiana.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Member who is interested in this bill, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on which side is he entered?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I really do not know. He is a Member from Louisiana, and he says that he is interested in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MECHANICAL REPRODUCTION OF MUSIC

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13452) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909, as amended, in respect to mechanical reproduction of musical compositions, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not object to this bill. I was about to ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over this morning. We have some matters under consideration and hope to get out of the bill some of the features that are objectionable, and we think we may be able to iron them out.

Mr. BUSBY. When is it the purpose of the chairman to call this up again? To-day or at a later date?

Mr. VESTAL. I would like to call it up to-day later, if these objections are eliminated.

Mr. BUSBY. I can not see that that would get us anywhere, because it would merely require my presence here all of the time. If it is passed over until a later date I shall not object at this time.

Mr. HUDSPETH. But they are trying now to iron out some of the differences.

Mr. BUSBY. I know, but this is not the time to iron out the differences, after we have gotten into the calling of the calendar.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman is not on the floor, I shall hold it over until next consent day.

Mr. BUSBY. But we can agree that it can go over until next consent day, and then neither the gentleman nor I would have to stay here. The question is whether or not these differences may be ironed out, and not having been ironed out I would not want it to go through.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. There have been negotiations in regard to ironing out these difficulties, and it is possible, even probable, that they will be ironed out so that the bill will be taken up later in the day. I think the gentleman could be notified in case the differences have been ironed out, and then no snap judgment would be taken on him.

Mr. BUSBY. Who is doing this ironing out on this bill?

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, the bill is entirely satisfactory to everybody concerned, except with reference to one particular group as to the effect of the provisions of the bill. They are endeavoring to draft an amendment and have now an amendment under consideration which will make the bill entirely satisfactory to that group, and if that is consummated, then there will be no objection whatever to the bill from anybody who has ever appeared before the committee.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Texas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does that group represent the retailers of music? Some of us are having wires from retailers of music and retailers of phonographs and radios, and so forth, seriously objecting to the bill. Is the group that is being consulted representatives of that industry?

Mr. LANHAM. I do not know that they are all retailers, except that they are the people who make mechanical records from whom the retailers get the records. Of all the people who have appeared before the Committee on Patents with reference to this measure, no dissatisfaction has been expressed with the provisions of the bill except by the group to whom I refer.

Mr. BURTNESS. Have the retailers been considered in connection with the matter?

Mr. LANHAM. We have considered the bill for about eight years and I think everybody has been before us.

Mr. BURTNESS. Some retailers wire me to the effect that the bill is a hold-up on the part of the New York publishers. I do not know anything about that. I am not here to object to the bill.

Mr. BUSBY. The retailer speaks largely for the public. The report on the bill says that the copyright holders and manufacturers seem to be getting in accord behind this legislation; but there is still another group for whom the retailers speak, and that is the public; and they are the ones that I am trying to represent here in offering my objection to this legislation.

Mr. BURTNESS. I have reached no conclusion on the bill. I am not here to object, but I wondered if the differences were ironed out whether it would include the retailer.

Mr. BUSBY. I do not think that would be satisfactory to me.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, if you are considering the public, the gentleman also wants to consider the composers and the authors.

Mr. BUSBY. But there is another story than is stated by that question. It is this—that a monopoly is provided in accordance with the Constitution, but the question is, How far can one who has that monopoly insist that he be protected? And that is the proposition that I am dealing with.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I want to suggest I do not think it is possible to hold this bill over to-day and reach a conclusion to-day. We have many interests during the afternoon, and I for one would like to have a little time. I would have to leave a committee this afternoon to do this.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. VESTAL. I am asking unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice and retain its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice and retain its place on the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. BUSBY. That, I understand, passes it over for this day?

The SPEAKER. It can only be brought up by unanimous consent.

Mr. BUSBY. But it could not be brought up under that request to-day?

The SPEAKER. It could be by unanimous consent.

Mr. BUSBY. That does not satisfy me, because I do not want to sit here all day. If the request does not carry it over until the next consent day, I am going to object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. The statement of the gentleman from Indiana ought to be sufficient, that he wished it to go over.

Mr. BUSBY. If he makes that statement——

Mr. VESTAL. I have already made the statement.

Mr. BUSBY. I did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

WATERS OF THE NORTH PLATTE RIVER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7026) granting the consent of Congress to compacts or agreements between the States of Colorado and Wyoming with respect to the division and apportionment of the waters of the North Platte River and other streams in which such States are jointly interested.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, there is no one interested in this bill except the people of the States of Colorado, Wyoming, and Nebraska, and the Representatives of those States are trying to reach an agreement, which I think we will, and I ask unanimous consent that this bill and the one following it remain on the calendar and be passed without prejudice. I am exceedingly anxious to have these two bills passed before this session of Congress adjourns.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CERTAIN INSANE CITIZENS OF ALASKA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 170) to provide for the care of certain insane citizens of the Territory of Alaska.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. It requires three objections.

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I have given some study to it, and I will withdraw my former objection and am for the bill except for a perfecting amendment. These dangerous insane in Alaska can not safely be cared for at the Morningside institution in Oregon, but at the present time they are taken in the State institution under contract with the State of Oregon. That institution is becoming congested, and it may not be possible to continue them later in that institution. Hence, the reason for this bill, to permit their transfer to St. Elizabeths.

I want to make this suggestion: I think the bill ought to be phrased so as to leave it discretionary with the department either to take these insane to a State institution on the coast or to bring them to St. Elizabeths. Of course, if they can not be placed in a State institution, they ought to be brought to St. Elizabeths. I think it ought to be discretionary.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make an objection.

The SPEAKER. Three objections have been made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CLASSIFICATION OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS OF MINNESOTA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12414) authorizing the classification of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CREATION OF INDIAN TRUST ESTATES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7204) to authorize the creation of Indian trust estates, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. The bill requires three objections.

Mr. CRAMTON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that it be passed over without prejudice. It may be reached on the Wednesday calendar, or it may not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RELIEF OF CONTRACTORS FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13857) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes," approved August 25, 1919, as amended.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, MIDDLE DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16034) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint an additional judge of the District Court of the United States for the Middle District of the State of Pennsylvania.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] is absent to-day, and has asked particularly that this matter be passed over without prejudice. Speaking for him, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, during the debate on the floor of the House the other day we were told that we did not have sufficient judges to take care of Federal cases, particularly alleged prohibition violations. Now we have a chance to increase the number of judges, so that the people will not have to wait a year or a year and a half before their cases are reached.

Mr. HOOPER. I ask the gentleman under the circumstances to withhold his objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, in connection with what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] has said, as I understand it, none of these additional judge bills which have been sent over to the Senate from this body have been passed by the Senate. That is true, is it not? I will ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] if that is not the case? Has the Senate passed any of these additional judge bills?

Mr. DYER. None of them that we have sent over has come back from the Senate.

Mr. CRAMTON. It would be more practical, then, to have those bills passed than to give an appropriation of $24,000,000 for the enforcement of prohibition.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Michigan, I may say that it has been stated by the Commissioner of Prohibition that it would be impossible for him to use the $24,000,000 in furtherance of the work of enforcing the law because the courts are clogged with cases pending for action. It is said that the judges give most all of their time to prohibition, and that many cases are awaiting trial and that the only way for those who are charged with the violation of the law to get rid of their cases is to plead guilty.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it the purpose of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] and the purpose of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] to enforce prohibition by having this additional judge in Pennsylvania?

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that while I did not vote for prohibition originally, every vote that has been cast by me since it became a law has been for the purpose of enforcing it in every way.

Mr. BLANTON. How about the gentleman's vote on the $24,000,000 enforcement amendment?

Mr. DYER. I voted against that because it is my opinion and of most everyone, generally speaking, outside of those who wish to play a little cheap politics, that it would be disastrous to the cause of prohibition to force money upon the officials when they say they can not use it under present conditions.

Mr. BLANTON. That is Mr. Mellon's idea.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, in response to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] this bill has been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask that it be passed over without prejudice. It has the unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary; at least, no objection has been made to it in the committee. I ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HOOPER. There are several Members who are very anxious to have some further information on this matter. I would like to have it understood that it is the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, not of myself.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] is the chairman of the committee. Evidently he is not upon the floor and the gentleman may be speaking for him, as he evidently is; but as a member of that committee, I feel it is not necessary for any one Member to be here for the purpose of enacting legislation that is needed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Perhaps the gentleman from Missouri can give the information that many Members of the House seek.

Mr. DYER. The report shows that there is very great need for this legislation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan that the bill may be passed over without prejudice?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. And, Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

JOINT-STOCK LAND BANKS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 4039) to exempt joint-stock land banks from the provisions of section 8 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I stated before, I can not see any purpose in amending the law so as to permit interlocking directors to sit on these boards. As I said before, what will happen will be that they will take the good loans and send them to their own banks and dump the bad loans on the joint-stock land banks, so I am going to object.

Mr. McFADDEN. I hope the gentleman will reserve his objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will reserve it in order to permit the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. McFADDEN. I want to reiterate that which I said the other day when this matter came up, that it was never intended when this law was passed to include these banks. These are not commercial institutions but are merely mortgage-loan banks.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not agree with the gentleman's viewpoint, as shown in his statement, that all the brains of the country are on the present boards of the banks.

Mr. McFADDEN. I did not intend to give that impression, but it would greatly help the management of these institutions to have the kind of direction which they would secure from bankers who are more or less familiar with the loan business, and I think they should have the right to serve on these boards. The Federal farm-loan system is asking for this legislation, and the request is indorsed by the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I shall object.

DISPOSAL OF MATERIAL TO THE SEA SCOUT DEPARTMENT OF THE BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15577) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to dispose of material to the sea-scout department of the Boy Scouts of America.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are there any gentlemen on the floor from the Naval Affairs Committee? If there is no one here who can give the information I desire, I will ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HALE. I do not know that I can give the gentleman the information he desires, but I will do so if I can.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This bill provides for the turning over of material by the Navy to the Boy Scouts. It is based on a bill which was heretofore passed authorizing the turning over of aviation material, but in that bill a clause was inserted which provided that the material turned over could not be used for flying. The gentleman understands the purpose of that. The purpose was that if we turned over obsolete equipment, we did not want to endanger the lives of anyone by having them use it for flying purposes. I find from the report that it is intended to turn over certain cutters, and what I want to know is this: If a cutter becomes obsolete and is unfit for use by the Navy, is it not unsafe to turn it over to the Boy Scouts?

Mr. HALE. As I recall, that suggestion was made in the committee. I think the language of the bill takes care of that by putting it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. That is so, is it not?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; but the bill provides for the disposal of "such condemned or obsolete material as may not be needed for the Navy." Now, when we provided for the turning over of aviation equipment it was specifically provided that it could not be used for flying purposes. My fear is that if we turn this obsolete material over to the Boy Scouts it would endanger their lives if they used it on the water. If it is condemned and obsolete material that is not seaworthy for the Navy, how could it be seaworthy for the Boy Scouts?

Mr. HALE. If it is not seaworthy material, then it should not be turned over to the Boy Scouts for that purpose. If the gentleman has in mind an amendment that would safeguard the matter, I am sure the committee would be glad to accept it, but it seems to me that the language in the bill, providing that it shall be turned over only at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy takes care of that situation. As I say, that feature was discussed in the committee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The bill provides for the turning over of—

Such condemned or obsolete material as may not be needed for the Navy.

Mr. HALE. Of course, the Secretary of the Navy ought not to turn over to the Boy Scouts any material that it is not safe for them to use.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly, and it is for that reason that I suggest that something should be included in this bill which would be along the line of the provision carried in the bill providing for the turning over of aviation equipment.

Mr. BURTNESS. If the gentleman will permit, some equipment might be obsolete but not unseaworthy.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not if it is condemned, and that is what I fear.

Mr. BURTNESS. But if it were limited to obsolete material, the situation would be entirely different.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; I agree with the gentleman, but I am afraid of the other language.

Mr. HALE. Has the gentleman an amendment prepared?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. I think the gentleman had better look into it further, and we will pass it the next time.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

HAY GROWERS IN BRAZORIA, GALVESTON, AND HARRIS COUNTIES, TEX.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15892) for the relief of hay growers in Brazoria, Galveston, and Harris Counties, Tex.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, I will say to the gentleman, but I have had no report from the department on this particular bill. Does the department report favorably upon it?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes, it does, I will state to my friend from Michigan, and also the Comptroller General. The Comptroller General reports favorably, and also prepared the bill, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. HOOPER. I personally have no objection to the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall object unless the gentleman agrees to an amendment. This is the proposition: Here are certain acts by employees or officials of the Department of Agriculture. I do not think they ought to pass upon their own acts, and the amendment which I suggest is, on page 1, where the bill now provides "to be found and reported by the Secretary of Agriculture," to insert "and determined by him," the Comptroller General.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will state to my friend from New York that the bill leaves it to the determination of the Comptroller General, and the gentleman's amendment would be surplusage, because he has to pass upon it under the terms of the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Permit me to read it. The bill now provides—on the basis of facts and figures to be found and reported by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. My amendment would provide—

That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to examine and settle, on the basis of facts and figures to be found and determined by him.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will state to my friend from New York, if he will read the report of the Comptroller General he will find that he has already reported favorably.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. All right.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I do not think the proposed amendment hurts, except in this way: We want to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill, the Senate bill being identical, and the proposition of the gentleman would prevent us from doing that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It would, of course, have to go back to the Senate.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Of course, the gentleman can offer his amendment to the Senate bill if he insists upon it. But I trust he will not insist upon the amendment. It is wholly unnecessary.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Under the bill it does go to the Comptroller General.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not see how my amendment would hurt.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Only it would necessarily have to go back to the Senate and the matter undoubtedly is taken care of now.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I trust the gentleman from New York will not insist on his amendment. The object now is to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill so it may pass at this session. I may say to the gentleman that the Comptroller General prepared this bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not see why we can not amend the Senate bill.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Oh, yes; we can amend the Senate bill if the gentleman insists on his amendment, but it is absolutely unnecessary.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think it is the proper thing to do.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I do not see a great deal of harm it can do except that it will delay the matter that much and perhaps necessitate a conference. The bill passed the committee unanimously and if the gentleman will read the Comptroller General's report he will find that he reports favorably now and suggested the bill that my colleague from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD] introduced.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I spent most of my Sunday reading the bill and the report.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I hope the gentleman will not object because the matter is left to the Comptroller General absolutely. He went into the matter fully and recommended the identical bill which my colleague introduced.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The bill came from the Comptroller General.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] satisfied that the Comptroller General can disregard the facts and figures submitted to him?

Mr. UNDERHILL. He does right straight along.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But in this instance, as a matter of law?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Massachusetts is a kind of a shark on these things, and if he is satisfied I am.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that an identical Senate bill (S. 4818) may be considered in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that a Senate bill (S. 4818) may be considered in lieu of the House bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the Senate bill got the same amendments?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes; it is identical.

Mr. SCHAFER. With the limitation with respect to attorneys' fees?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes; absolutely.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes; we had that placed in the Senate bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I notice that the House bill is a direct appropriation and not an authorization.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The Committee on Claims has that right.

Mr. DYER. Further reserving the right to object, may I inquire if the Texas delegation is united in support of this bill?

Mr. HUDSPETH. In this instance I assure the gentleman the delegation is absolutely united.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and the clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to examine and settle, on the basis of facts and figures to be found and reported by the Secretary of Agriculture, the claims of hay growers in Brazoria, Galveston, and Harris Counties, Tex., who were prevented during the year 1925 from harvesting their hay because of quarantine restrictions against the spread of the hoof-and-mouth disease: Provided, That the allowance made on any such claim shall not exceed the amount paid thereon by the Livestock Sanitary Commission of Texas, pursuant to an act of the State legislature approved October 6, 1926. There is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient amount, not to exceed $218,177.50, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay such of the claims as may be allowed by the Comptroller General: Provided, That no part of the amount of any item appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum which in the aggregate exceeds 10 per cent of the amount of any item appropriated in this act on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

YUMA MESA AUXILIARY PROJECTS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15918) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize credit upon the construction charges of certain water-right applicants and purchasers on the Yuma and Yuma Mesa auxiliary projects, and for other purposes."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have further opportunity to study this bill. The Yuma situation is rather complicated. I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. What is the information the gentleman desires?

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to study the situation, and I have not yet had an opportunity to do it. I will do so before the next Consent Calendar is taken up.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Is the gentleman going to object?

Mr. CRAMTON. I shall have to do it to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan that the bill go over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED LAND IN MANCHESTER, N. H.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 4739) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell certain Government-owned land at Manchester, N. H.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, this authorizes the sale of Government-owned property to an identified purchaser. This is a very unusual situation.

Mr. HALE. The land is in the city of Manchester, in my district. The proceeding is somewhat unusual, and I recognize the propriety of the gentleman's question. This is a Treasury Department bill. The joint committee on public buildings has made a trade which is exceedingly advantageous for the Government for a piece of land which the Government does not need. The proceeds of this sale, I understand, are to be applied to the purchase of land on the other side for the construction of an addition to a Manchester public building.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then it is not a trade, but the sale of one piece of land and the purchase of another?

Mr. HALE. That is true, of course. The joint committee had in mind something in the nature of a trade. It had in mind the sale of this portion of the Government-owned land and the purchase of other land on the other side. The New Hampshire Fire Insurance Co. is the adjoining owner, and it has constructed a fine building. The land which it is proposed to sell them is 25 feet front, and nobody would want it except the fire insurance company. They have offered a price which is twice as much per foot as the Government is paying for land on the other side.

I may say that I think the gentleman from New York wants to be fair about it, and under ordinary circumstances I think the proposed amendment ought to be made requiring it to be sold at public auction. But the situation is this: We are very anxious—and so is the Treasury Department—to have the legislation passed as it has passed the Senate. If it is amended there is a hazard about the amendment becoming adopted in the other body. There are tenants who are in an uncomfortable situation and do not know whether to move or not. For that reason it seems desirable that the legislation be passed.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, do I understand the gentleman to state that not far from the land covered in this bill the Government is to purchase land at twice the amount that the land is to be sold for?

Mr. HALE. No; it is to purchase land for one-half the amount that this is to be sold for—about $3 a foot; and we are getting for the land we are selling $6 a foot.

Mr. SCHAFER. What is the assessed value of land in that vicinity?

Mr. HALE. I have not the assessed value, but the land we are selling is right across the street from the land we are to purchase on the other side; precisely the same location.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman's argument is almost irresistible, but not quite, and I am constrained to object.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed temporarily to give the gentleman from New Hampshire an opportunity to prepare an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed temporarily. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SEA SCOUTS OF AMERICA

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 1096 (H. R. 15577), to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to dispose of obsolete material to the sea scout department of the Boy Scouts of America.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 1096. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Has the Member who made the objection when the bill was before us a few minutes ago withdrawn his objection?

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, it was passed over without prejudice. I was not in the room.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to dispose of without charge, except for transportation and delivery, to the sea scout department of the Boy Scouts of America such condemned or obsolete material as may not be needed for the Navy, and such other material as may be spared at prices representing its fair value to the Navy.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, there appears to be no objection to this bill from the department or from the Director of the Budget. The bill merely authorizes the Navy Department to convey to the sea scouts of America such obsolete material as the department has no use for—old rowboats, sails, spars—with which these boys may play and practice on the seacoast and on the shores of the inland lakes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will remember when we passed a similar bill turning over certain aviation property we provided that it could not be used for flying purposes. My fear is this: If you turn over some property that is not seaworthy the boys may be endangered by using it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's fear is very well founded. The very object of turning over this obsolete material to the Boy Scouts is to make ship carpenters and real sailormen out of them and to teach them in the craft of seamanship. There are 600,000 boys in the major organization to-day, and 200,000 men. It is an organization incorporated by an act of Congress in 1916. The gentleman may be assured that the objection he has referred to in respect to flying material does not enter into this situation at all.

Mr. Speaker, the organization known as the Boy Scouts of America was incorporated by the act approved June 15, 1916 (U. S. C. title 36, sec. 21), the purpose of which was stated as follows:

> The purpose of the corporation shall be to promote, through organization and cooperation with other agencies, the ability of boys to do things for themselves and others, to train them in scoutcraft, and to teach them patriotism, courage, self-reliance, and kindred virtues, using the methods which were in common use by Boy Scouts on June 15, 1916.

While sea scouting as a branch of the Boy Scouts of America dates back to the early days of the scout movement in this country, it was only two years ago that the sea scout department was officially organized in order to meet a wide and growing demand for progressive training of older boys—from 15 to 19 years of age—in seamanship and water activities generally, under the direction of able seamen.

The sea scout program is essentially a program for older boys. Its ultimate objectives are the same as those of land scouting. The promotion and carrying out of this program is similar in nearly every way to land scouting, the only essential difference being in the type of activities, the uniform, and requirements.

The activities of sea scouts are concerned with things connected with the water—swimming, sailing, rowing, sea history, marlinspike seamanship, ground tackle, life aboard ship, rules of the road at sea, foreign commerce, navigation, piloting, signaling, and cruising.

The sea scout department is operated, as are all other departments of the national council of the Boy Scouts of America, through its executive board, with a director known as the national sea scout director. A committee, known as the national sea scout committee, serves as an advisory committee to the executive board in all matters relating to sea scouting. This committee is made up of representative men throughout the country who are interested in the sea scout program for scouts.

Mr. Speaker, there are approximately 700 individual councils of the Boy Scouts of America, scattered over practically the entire United States, with a total enrollment of 800,000 men and boys—200,000 men and 600,000 boys. In any of these local councils, where there is a sufficient number of older boys 15 years of age and over, a sea scout "ship," as the unit of organization in sea scouting is called, may be organized.

Under high-grade leaders these older boys, as sea scouts, continue their training in character development and citizenship and are instructed in the art of seamanship through the use of boats and yachts, acquiring as well a sound knowledge of international trade through literature and a consciousness of the glorious traditions of the sea history of our country. The major work of training sea scouts in seamanship is done in whaleboats.

The attached copy of the sea scout manual will give an idea of the scope and all-around character of the training which sea scouts receive. On enrolling as a sea scout, each boy is required to take the following sea promise:

> On my honor, I will do my best—
> 1. To learn swimming and always be prepared to render aid to those in need in connection with water accidents.
> 2. To make it my practice to know the location of the life-saving devices on every boat I board; and to mentally outline my responsibility in maintaining order for myself and shipmates in case of emergency.
> 3. To be vigilant and cautious, always guarding against water accidents.
> 4. To cooperate with the responsible authorities for the observance of all regulations for the conduct and safety of boats and ever seek to preserve the motto of the sea, "Women and children first."

At the present time there are about 300 sea scout "ships" in the United States, and it is hoped ultimately to establish sea scout units in each of the 700 councils of the Boy Scouts. The present aim of the sea scout department is for a total enrollment of 100,000 sea scouts. The attached tables show the number of sea scout units that had been organized up to and including December 31, 1928, arranged by regions, cities, and States, with the total enrollments in each.

An interesting development in the sea scout movement has been the increase in the number of cruises made on rivers in the interior parts of the country, where groups of sea scouts have built their own boats, rigged them with outboard motors, and made long cruises, lasting two and three and even four weeks. That the sea scout program is not one for the sea coast only is proved by the fact that the majority of the units now in existence are in the interior parts of the country, where the activities are carried out on small rivers and lakes.

Mr. Speaker, almost on the threshold of its history, the sea scout movement was given an opportunity to demonstrate its ability to develop character and inculcate in its members the importance of the motto, "Be prepared." A prominent Arctic explorer, Capt. John Borden, of Chicago, who having made all preparations for an exploration of the Arctic on a sailing vessel to collect specimens of fauna for the Field Museum, was confronted with the problem of selecting a crew for his vessel. Owing to the many unusual circumstances surrounding this expedition, the standards which these men had to meet were unusually high and a search through the usual channels failed to produce one man.

High moral character, perfect physical fitness, ability to endure hardships, thorough knowledge of seamanship—such were the minimum standards.

Being convinced that among its ranks there were many young men who could live up to these standards, the sea scout leaders of Chicago offered to Captain Borden the services of eight sea scouts. They were examined and found fully qualified.

In April, 1927, they set sail from San Francisco on the 140-foot auxiliary schooner Northern Light, and for five months cruised in the waters of the Pacific Ocean, Bering Sea, and the Arctic Ocean. One of the most ideal adventures for boys that could be conceived—helping in all of the work aboard ship; collecting the specimens for the museum; studying various parts of the northland, and arriving back in San Francisco, having fulfilled to the very utmost all of the promises that were made for them.

This is the first time in the history of polar expeditions that a boat has gone into the Arctic with a deck crew entirely composed of boys under 19 years of age.

This event proves three things: First, that the training given to young men in sea scouting helps to put into practice in a very splendid way the character training given to them in the land scout troops; second, that the average American boy can adjust himself to conditions at sea after training in sea scouting; third, that the sea scout programs opens up to the boys of America opportunities for adventure such as all boys crave, and this, under circumstances where they are surrounded by all the precautions for safety, high-grade leadership, and preparedness.

It is interesting also to note that Paul A. Siple, the Boy Scout who was chosen to accompany Commander Byrd on his Antarctic expedition, is a member of the crew of the sea scout ship Niagara of Erie, Pa. He received his first experience of training in seamanship on a whale boat.

At the time of the hurricane disaster in Florida, the sea scouts rendered valiant service. According to a statement from the relief detail in that section of the Everglades in Florida, the gallant little group of sea scouts in Sarasota, Fla., under the direction of County Judge A. R. Clark, "did more work and accomplished more results in this grim job than all of the adult relief workers in the territory combined."

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Does this require the department to turn over all this surplus or the condemned property?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; it merely authorizes it to so dispose of obsolete material.

Mr. MICHENER. To turn it over to the sea scouts?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman makes a distinction between the sea scouts and the Boy Scouts?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; they operate independently.

Mr. MICHENER. For instance, under existing law, where the department disposes of this condemned property by public sale, would this prevent the Boy Scouts from bidding for some of this material?

Mr. BRITTEN. Not a bit. On the contrary, the bill provides where the material, although obsolete, has some cash value, the department may sell it to the sea scouts at its cash value to the department.

Mr. MICHENER. I do not know anything about the sea scouts, unless they are a part of the Boy Scouts, and the Boy Scouts in my district during last year received some of these boats, purchased from the Coast Guard on the Great Lakes. Would this prevent the sale or delivery to the Boy Scouts of America of any of this material?

Mr. BRITTEN. Not at all.

Mr. MICHENER. And give preference to the sea scouts?

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, no. The gentleman will be surprised to learn that there are nearly 300 units of sea scouts in the United States.

Mr. MICHENER. I am not surprised at all, but I do not want to consent to any legislation here that will make it possible on the part of the department or mandatory on the part of the department to turn over to the sea scouts property to the detriment of the Boy Scouts.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is true. I agree with the gentleman, but there is nothing like that in the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, instances could be cited where sea scouts have been instrumental in saving persons from drowning, and where assistance has been rendered to boats and ships in distress by sea scouts while on training cruises.

Sea scout training is of considerable assistance in the training of young men entering colleges and universities, who enroll in the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps, since they have usually spent one or two years learning the rudiments of sea scouting and much time is saved in their preliminary seamanship instructions. The sea scout organization is a very valuable source of supply of desirable personnel for the Navy and the Naval Reserve. Recently one reserve division was filled by enrolling ex-sea scouts and another reserve division includes almost a complete troop of ex-sea scouts.

In order to encourage sea scout movement as much as possible, the Secretary of the Navy, on May 15, 1927, authorized all force commanders, commanding officers of ships, commandants of districts, navy yards, and stations, to cooperate, as far as circumstances permit, whenever an application bearing the approval of the national headquarters of the Boy Scouts of America is received from a duly accredited representative of the organization of the sea scouts department. Individual officers, both active and retired, were requested to lend their aid and encouragement. Attention was invited, however, to the fact that no provision of law permitted the loan of property or the expenditure of naval funds.

At the present time, under the law, the Navy Department is limited in the sale of material to sea scout organizations by the act of July 9, 1918 (40 Stat. 850), which restricts such sales to materials procured during the war period. Under this authority, pulling boats, and more recently power boats, procured during the war period, are offered for sale to sea scout organizations for training purposes, prior to offering such boats at public sale. However, the sea scouts are very desirous of being permitted to buy other articles of equipment, such as sextants, compasses, flags, masts, sails, oars, etc. With this in mind, and in order to be able to cooperate more fully, the Navy Department has recommended the enactment by Congress of the bill now before the House.

The enactment of this bill will permit the Secretary of the Navy to render such assistance to the sea scout department of the Boy Scouts of America as may be practicable, without cost, or at little cost, to the Navy Department.

The legislation proposed will not result in any increased cost to the Government.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman object to striking out the words "condemned or," in line 6?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; I have no objection to that, and shall move such an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the words "condemned or" in line 6 of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCHAFER. I don't think this bill has gone by the objection stage. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to return to the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair put the question as to whether there was objection to the present consideration of the bill. The bill has been read and the gentleman from Illinois now offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRITTEN: Line 6, after the word "such," strike out the words "condemned or."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BUST OF LIEUTENANT GILLISS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13935) to provide for the purchase of a bronze bust of the late Lieut. James Melville Gilliss, United States Navy, to be presented to the Chilean National Observatory.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] consent to the usual amendment that I offer to bills of this kind?—

Provided, That such bust shall be the work of an artist who is a citizen of the United States.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, a good opportunity has not hitherto presented itself for me to express my views upon the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGUARDIA]. I regret to say that his view of the matter does not appeal to me.

In this particular instance the request came from the Secretary of the Navy. No Member of the House has any personal interest in the matter, and the question raised can be met without any factor of prejudice. So I think we might as well have this issue faced at the moment. While it is true that we desire to encourage American artists as well as American manufacturers and producers, it is the fact that there are in this country certain capable, meritorious, and even distinguished artists, not yet citizens, some of whom have come from the country in which the gentleman from New York is, I think, much interested.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The gentleman from New York is only interested in one country, and that is the United States.

Mr. LUCE. I am delighted to hear that. I will modify my statement and say any other gentleman in the House under like circumstances would be interested under these conditions I think we may recognize the fact that to restrict the selection of artists to those who have taken out naturalization papers or who were born in this country might result at times in our securing an inferior grade of artistic skill. I do not feel that your Committee on the Library should thus be hampered in getting the most beautiful works of art that they can secure. Therefore if the gentleman should insist upon his position and refuse consent to consideration of this bill, I would have to look for some later opportunity to find out what the House may think in the matter.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The gentleman does not mean to imply that if we limit certain works of art which we authorize to American artists we will obtain inferior work?

Mr. LUCE. I meant to bring out that there have been models presented to us by men born abroad who have come over here to contribute to our store of art, and who should have an opportunity to offer us their artistic skill.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I will.

Mr. SCHAFER. If we follow the gentleman's line of argument, we should not have a protective tariff, but leave to the foreigners an opportunity to enter into competition with American industry and labor.

Mr. LUCE. I tried to bring out that I thought the world of art was living under different conditions from the world of industry and production. May I suggest that recently when the Dominion of Australia sought to secure the finest plan it could get for a new capital, it was not hampered by such a condition as that here proposed, and so was able to give the award to a citizen of this country. Hitherto art has known no geographical lines, and I hope we will not establish a precedent that will ever hamper art by geographical lines.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Art has heretofore had no geographical confines, it is true, and this very condition that has been described arose by giving the award to foreign artists on account of social connections, and so forth, and then they left for home, performed their work, and sent it over. American art is entitled to just as much protection as the manufacturers of the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. LUCE. But I submit to the gentleman one consideration: If the gentleman's logic is to prevail, the delightful concerts that are given here by symphony orchestras and the charming chamber music in the Coolidge auditorium of the Library of Congress ought to be stopped unless hereafter musicians and conductors are either native born or naturalized Americans. We ought not to be allowed to invite over here men and women who have shown their eminence in the great concert halls of Europe. Our programs ought to omit the names of Wagner and Haydn and Handel and Bach and Beethoven in order that we may encourage American composers.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The fact is that American sculptors and painters have not jazzed their work as American musicians have done.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Paralleling with this, I recall that a few months ago, when Congress wished to pass an act to give recognition to an American citizen—the aviator Ellsworth—the gentleman from New York only permitted that to pass on condition that we join with that recognition a similar recognition for a distinguished Italian—General Nobile.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And Roald Amundsen, a Norwegian, who was in the same joint adventure.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am willing to submit my amendment to the House and allow the House to decide on it. I shall offer my amendment. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to procure and present to the Chilean National Observatory, in the name of the United States Naval Observatory, a bronze bust of the late Lieut. James Melville Gilliss, United States Navy, such bust to be made at a price and in accordance with design determined by him.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,200 for the purposes of this act.

With committee amendments as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the words "Secretary of the Navy" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Joint Committee on the Library, acting on the advice of the Commission of Fine Arts."

Page 1, line 5, after the word "procure," strike out the words "and present" and insert in lieu thereof the words "for presentation."

Page 1, line 6, after the word "Observatory," insert the words "through the Secretary of the Navy."

Page 1, line 9, after the word "Navy," strike out the balance of the section.

Page 2, line 5, after the word "of," insert the words "not more than."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 2, line 6, strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following: "Provided, That said bust shall be the work of an artist who is a citizen of the United States."

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment. It is not necessary for me to repeat what I have already said, but I would like to emphasize the fact that your Committee on the Library is trying to use every opportunity that presents itself to improve the quality of the artistic decorations of the Capitol, the artistic ornamentations of the District of Columbia, and such other works of art as come within our control. The names of a large percentage of the artists who are brought to our attention indicate foreign birth or descent. Not a few of them are young men who have been trained in the artistic centers of Europe and have come here with the ambition to make their way by contributing to the artistic beauties of the United States. It seems to me that it would be unwise to deprive them of the opportunity of sharing in the competitions that are held from time to time in order that we may secure the best artistic talent available.

For this reason, sir, I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak in favor of my amendment. I want to point out to the House that the anxiety that the gentleman from Massachusetts has to the embellishment of the National Capitol has absolutely nothing to do with this case, because this bust is to be presented to the Chilean National Observatory. I submit that if we are to present a work of art to a foreign government it should be the work of an American artist. [Applause.]

The trouble is now, Mr. Speaker, that there are a few perambulating foreign artists with certain social connections here who do not maintain studios in this country, but who are in a position through social connections to obtain commissions for some of the largest commissions for artistic works. American art has arrived at that stage where it can compete favorably with the art of any country of the world. I have confidence in the Fine Arts Commission, who are to be intrusted with the work, that when they select the work of an American artist they will select one of the highest standard.

Mr. CRAMTON. I notice that the Committee on the Library is to procure this bust. Has the gentleman any fear that social allurements will tempt the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The question answers itself.

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly it is not going to be a matter of social pull, but a matter of merit.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is sufficient merit among the American artists to present the right kind of work, and they are entitled to the preference. I want to say that every country in Europe giving commissions to artists give them to their own artists.

The other day I received a letter from one of the art societies in this country pointing out that on the other side of the Capitol there is now a bill pending providing for a painting of the President, which is a $5,000 commission, and unless we safeguard that in all likelihood it will go to a foreign artist who does not live in this country and who does not maintain a studio in this country. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a proper amendment and one that will offer moral encouragement to American art.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAGUARDIA) there were—ayes 11, noes 42.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED LAND AT MANCHESTER, N. H.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 1099, Senate bill 4739, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell certain Government-owned land at Manchester, N. H. This bill was passed over temporarily and I think I have prepared an amendment which will meet the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 1099. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman intends to offer an amendment, which he will support, striking out the provision of the bill for the sale of the land to a designated private party and providing for the sale of the land at public auction?

Mr. HALE. Precisely, to the highest bidder after public advertisement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to sell to the New Hampshire Fire Insurance Co., for an amount not less than $20,000, the easterly 25 feet of the Government-owned site at Manchester, N. H., at such time and upon such terms as he may deem to be to the best interests of the United States, and to convey such property to the purchaser thereof by the usual quit-claim deed, the proceeds of such sale to be deposited in the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HALE: Page 1, line 5, strike out the words "New Hampshire Fire Insurance Co." and insert in lieu thereof the words "highest bidder, after public advertisement."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ROUGH RIVER, KY.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14893) to authorize a preliminary survey of Rough River in Kentucky with a view to the control of its floods.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is not this river included in the legislation which was passed at the last session providing for a comprehensive flood-relief program?

Mr. MOORMAN. I think not, sir.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How did it happen to be omitted?

Mr. MOORMAN. The omnibus bill had gone to the Senate, and then this project was recognized as being an emergency, and the committee passed it for that reason.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The bill simply provides for a survey?

Mr. MOORMAN. That is all.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Which is an opening wedge?

Mr. MOORMAN. That is all.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman contend that we did not pass legislation allowing for a complete survey of all the tributaries of the Mississippi and other navigable streams?

Mr. MOORMAN. I make no such contention about the matter. I state, though, that this is considered necessary, and for that reason the committee reported the bill.

Mr. HUDSON. I think the gentleman will find we have passed legislation taking care of all these matters, so far as surveys are concerned.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If that be true, then the passage of this bill would do no harm.

Mr. DYER. Why not let the bill go over in order to make an inquiry and ascertain whether this river has been taken care of.

Mr. MOORMAN. I will say to the gentleman that a similar bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator BARKLEY, which was attached to the omnibus bill that went over from the House.

Mr. HOOPER. If the gentleman will permit, does the gentleman and also the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] take the position that if this bill passes and the survey has been taken care of in the preliminary legislation, that this then would be mere surplusage and would commit the Government to no additional expense as far as the earlier bill is concerned?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I should not think so.

Mr. HUDSON. I wish the gentleman would allow this bill and the bill following it to go over for the day. I do not want to object, but I wish the gentleman would allow it to go over for the day.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Let me say this to the gentleman: This river is a tributary to the Ohio, and in the bill to which reference has been made this river was not named.

Mr. SABATH. Did not the bill provide for the Ohio, the Mississippi, and all tributaries thereof?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Only those tributaries of the Ohio that were named and this river was not among those named.

Mr. SABATH. I do not see why we should bring in separate bills for all these small rivers if the same thing is included in the general bill.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. There were separate bills and those bills were included in the omnibus bill, but this river was not named in that bill.

Mr. MOORMAN. I trust the gentleman will withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to cause an examination and survey to be made of Rough River, beginning at Falls of Rough, Grayson County, Ky., and extending to the mouth of said river, with a view to securing a channel of such dimensions and courses as will prevent present retarding of the flow of its waters and consequent flooding of thousands of acres of valuable adjacent land, and such other action and relief as is necessary. Also to submit a report to Congress of the feasibility of controlling said flood waters, together with an estimate of the cost of such improvement.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, on page 1, line 10, after the word "lands," to strike out the language "and such other action and relief as is necessary."

Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MOORMAN] to the fact that this bill, as I understand it, is for a preliminary survey and report to Congress.

Mr. MOORMAN. It is; yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. For that purpose the language which my amendment seeks to strike out is unnecessary and is rather too broad. It might give the Secretary of War the power to go ahead and do the work of flood control, and I do not think we ought to set that precedent in these bills for preliminary surveys.

Mr. MOORMAN. I will say to my colleague I intended to make it broad; and if I made it too broad, I will be pleased to accept the amendment.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I think that ought to go out.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK of Texas: Page 1, line 10, after the word "lands," strike out the comma, insert a period, and strike out the words "and such other action and relief as is necessary."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MUD CREEK, KY.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15809) to authorize a preliminary survey of Mud Creek in Kentucky, with a view to the control of its floods.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this a navigable stream?

Mr. MOORE of Kentucky. It is not a navigable stream.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is just for flood relief?

Mr. MOORE of Kentucky. It is for flood relief; yes.

Mr. DYER. It is to make it navigable. They want to get the mud out of it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And they are doing that under the guise of flood relief?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I will say to the gentleman that this is a bill similar to the one we just passed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think the one we just passed is bad.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I do not admit that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This is the last individual survey bill and flood relief that is going to pass by unanimous consent.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. I want to put myself on record as not individually opposing these bills on that proposition. If we bring in here a similar bill for every stream in the United States, the Corps of Engineers is going to be swamped. I think this is all taken care of in the general bill, and these individual bills ought not to be introduced or passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary survey to be made of Mud Creek in Kentucky from Mining City, at which point said creek empties into Green River, up to a point 25 or 30 miles in distance where a drainage project has been started by owners of the land on and near said creek, with a view to the control of its floods. Also to submit a report to Congress as to the feasibility of controlling the said flood waters by a drainage project, together with an estimate of the cost of said improvement.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ASSISTANT TO ENGINEER COMMISSIONER OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1624) to authorize the payment of additional compensation to the assistants to the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

SOBOBA INDIAN RESERVATION, CALIF.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the next bill (H. R. 15092) to authorize an appropriation to pay half the cost of a bridge near the Soboba Indian Reservation, Calif., has already been considered on Calendar Wednesday, and, without objection, the bill will be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

PUBLIC ALLEY IN SQUARE 1083, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 3771) vacating the alley between lots 16 and 17, square 1083, District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, as there is no one present to explain the necessity for vacating this alley, I object.

GRAIN ELEVATORS' RELIEF

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 194) authorizing the President to ascertain, adjust, and pay certain claims of grain elevators and grain firms to cover insurance and interest on wheat during the years 1919 and 1920, as per a certain contract authorized by the President.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I understand this bill has been passed by the House and Senate and was signed to-day by the President. Accordingly, it should be stricken from the calendar, I suggest.

Mr. SINCLAIR. A similar Senate bill was passed.

Mr. HOOPER. And has been signed by the President?

Mr. SINCLAIR. It has been signed; yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the better procedure would be to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. HOOPER. I move then, Mr. Speaker, that this bill be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PETERSBURG NATIONAL MILITARY PARK

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13693) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer a portion of the Camp Lee Military Reservation to the Petersburg National Military Park.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer to the Petersburg National Military Park such portion of the Camp Lee Military Reservation, Va., as in his discretion may be required in connection with the establishment of the Petersburg National Military Park, as authorized by the Act of Congress approved July 3, 1926.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RADIO AND COMMUNICATION CENTER AT BOLLING FIELD, D. C.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13931) to authorize an appropriation for the construction of a building for a radio and communication center at Bolling Field, D. C.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, may I inquire why it is not possible for the Government to concentrate all its radio activities in one station? I understand the Navy has a high-powered station at Arlington. Are we not doing exactly what we object to others doing, jamming the atmosphere with wave lengths?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I would say in answer to my distinguished colleague from New York that that is exactly the purpose of this bill. At the present time the radio transmission is performed in four scattered sections of the District. The purpose of this bill is to concentrate the radio transmission and communication centers at one point in the capital area. It will be done at a very small expense. The authorized appropriation is only $30,000. If the gentleman will examine the report on the bill, he will see that it will effect a very great economy.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will it restrict the area?

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield? I understand the Senate Committee on Military Affairs has recently taken action with a view to abandoning certain aviation fields. Does the gentleman know whether Bolling Field is one of those fields that it is proposed to abandon?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I have not heard of any abandonment of Bolling Field. There are certain minor objections that exist in Bolling Field, but I doubt if there has been any serious proposal to abandon it.

Mr. CRAMTON. The action I refer to might include Bolling Field without the gentleman's knowledge. It was action taken without anyone knowing anything about it. I have seen a discussion in the newspapers of a proposition to abandon Bolling Field.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. If the gentleman will notice, there is an amendment to the bill providing that this communication center may be in Bolling Field or any other point in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How about the station at Arlington?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. That is a naval station.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Could they not concentrate all the radio activities there?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I am not sure that I am familiar enough with the details of the subject to answer that specific question. Of course, the Army radio activities and that of the Navy are entirely separate. As I understand, this is a transmission of radio information as to the atmosphere in various parts of the country for the purpose of aviation.

Mr. CRAMTON. What does the gentleman think, if the Military Committees are about to reopen the proposition that was up two or three years ago to decide which fields are to be abandoned in the future; if that is the case, would it not be well to have all the appropriation bills affecting aviation fields held in abeyance until the legislative program is determined upon?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I would say to my distinguished friend from Michigan that that time is so far off that it would not be worth while to hold this necessary measure in abeyance on that accord. The bill is not a very important bill as far as the amount involved is concerned but very important in its purpose, and I hope the gentlemen who express interest in it, in view of the fact that the object is important, will resolve any doubt they may have in favor of its passage and refrain from any objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, may I say this—I am not going to object. I understood that Congress passed a bill two or three years ago designating what fields would be retained. I had not supposed the question was now before Congress as to the discontinuance of any of these fields. I learned incidentally that it is up before the Senate, but as the gentleman has indicated I assume that Congress is not going to reverse itself within two years.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, it is not the amount of land to be used but it is a question of the use of the air. At the present time we are seeking to limit the number of privately owned stations, and it seems to me that the Government ought to set a good example and concentrate all the radio activities at one station. We have a powerful station at Arlington. I think we ought to have more information upon this bill and I ask unanimous consent that it go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL in the chair). The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN NATIONAL PARK

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15657) to provide for the improvement and preservation of the land and buildings of the Abraham Lincoln National Park or reservation.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, which I expect to do, no one in this House but is thoroughly in sympathy with any proposal to honor the memory of Abraham Lincoln, so that that is not involved in my attitude on this bill. The bill is entirely unnecessary. There is just as much law authorizing appropriations for the maintenance and improvement of the Abraham Lincoln National Park as there will be if we pass this bill. I have read the report. I have sympathy with the idea that probably more funds are needed for that purpose, but I have confidence that if that matter is presented in a proper way, if something more than mere resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Hodgenville are available, that the appropriation estimates will come in in a regular way and the money necessary will be appropriated, whatever it may be. I have here extracts from the act which is now law that makes it perfectly clear that appropriations are authorized. If appropriations without limit are now authorized by existing law, why pass a new law to authorize appropriations?

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of War submitted an estimate of something over $80,000 for these appropriations. The Director of the Budget said that he was not sure about the authorization involved in the basic act of 1916, and he thought there would have to be or ought to be further legislation. If this could have come through the regular channels, there would have been no occasion for this bill, but the Bureau of the Budget has not taken that position. This is the only way in which this property can be properly cared for.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I can not imagine that the Bureau of the Budget will take that position finally. If they do, it means that we will have to duplicate all of our laws authorizing appropriations. In section 211, reading part of it, we find the following:

The United States accepts title to the lands mentioned in the deed of gift or conveyance now in the possession of the Secretary of War, together with all of the buildings and appurtenances thereon, especially the log cabin in which Abraham Lincoln was born and the memorial hall inclosing the same; * * * that the land therein described in such deed or conveyance * * * shall be forever dedicated to the purposes of a national park or reservation, the United States of America agreeing to protect and preserve the said lands, buildings, and appurtenances, and especially the log cabin in which Abraham Lincoln was born and the memorial hall inclosing the same, from spoliation and destruction and further disintegration, to the end that they may be preserved for all time. * * *

That clearly, just as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MOORMAN] has asserted in his speech, establishes law and authority for the appropriations. Section 212 provides among others things:

* * * and further shall forever protect, preserve, and maintain said land, buildings, and appurtenances, and especially the log cabin, * * * to the end that they may be preserved for all time as far as may be as a national park or reservation.

We give there the duty to the War Department to maintain and protect this memorial, and that carries with it, as the Chair here has repeatedly ruled, authority for appropriations.

Mr. THATCHER. But what is to be done when the Bureau of the Budget is unwilling to pass these estimates submitted by the War Department on to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. CRAMTON. I can not believe that after they read the law the Bureau of the Budget will refuse the estimate on that ground.

Mr. THATCHER. But I discussed this matter with General Lord himself, and that was his view of the question. That is the only purpose of this bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. The law is just as clear as can be. The responsibility is here to preserve and protect, and that carries with it authority to appropriate money for that purpose.

Mr. THATCHER. This bill has the sanction of the War Department and is shown to be not inconsistent with the financial program of the President. It can do no harm to pass the bill. It will clear up the matter and will enable the proper appropriations to be submitted.

Mr. CRAMTON. Has the gentleman a letter from the Budget Bureau that they hold that the law does not give authority?

Mr. THATCHER. There is a letter saying that it is not inconsistent with the financial program of the President.

Mr. MOORMAN. Here is a letter from the War Department, Washington, January 1——

Mr. CRAMTON. I have read the letter in the report, and not only that, but I have read the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky and I agree with him that legislation is unnecessary. I shall either object to it or ask to have it go over.

Mr. THATCHER. The gentleman can object if he wishes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

THE CONSENT CALENDAR

EMPLOYMENT OF ENGINEERS FOR CONSULTATION PURPOSES ON RECLAMATION WORK

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 4528) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to employ engineers and economists for consultation purposes on important reclamation work.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, last week I took occasion, on the floor of the House, to call attention to the continuation of reclamation work in connection with the situation that confronts this country in regard to marketing its surplus crops. This is one of the bills that affects that situation, because there is more in this proposal than shows on the surface. In a letter from Dr. Elwood Mead, the Commissioner of Reclamation, we find the statement that these experts are necessary for the purpose of considering the location of dams and dam sites in the Columbia River Basin, a new proposition not yet fully authorized.

The proposal is one of several proposals now pending, and I understand from information I have that the House may consider the matter this afternoon under suspension of the rules. I simply want to call the attention of the House to the fact that I am going to object to this bill and all of these proposals from now on.

Mr. CRAMTON. Before the gentleman commits himself too definitely let me explain this situation to the gentleman. Whether a Member is opposed to new reclamation projects or favors them should have nothing to do in regard to his attitude toward this bill. The passage of this bill does not approve any new projects or extend any old ones. It is only intended to do this, that where investigations are authorized or where projects are approved that the engineering and geological work, if I may use that term, shall be conducted as wisely and as efficiently as possible. If the appropriations are made for these investigations the appropriations will be used whether this bill passes or not, and these investigations will be made whether this bill passes or not. If this bill does pass it enables the Secretary of the Interior, where he thinks it is necessary, to use outside help in connection with these investigations, instead of confining it entirely to the Reclamation Service. A gentleman whether he is for an extension of projects or not, ought not to permit it to influence his attitude toward this bill. He ought to desire this, as a Member of this House he ought to desire that these investigations be made as efficiently as possible, and that is all this does.

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say I am referring now to the report. Here is the letter from Elwood Mead, commissioner, in answer to what the gentleman said here——

Mr. CRAMTON. I have read the quotation. There will be no investigation until that investigation is authorized by Congress. Some investigations are now authorized and under way, and if the investigation is authorized then under this experts could be called in, but this resolution of itself does not authorize any investigation.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield? I desire to secure some information.

Mr. CRAMTON. If I may be permitted.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Is it the understanding of the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Idaho, chairman of the committee [Mr. SMITH], that any charge incurred under the authorization of this bill under general law would be chargeable against the project?

Mr. CRAMTON. Well, I assume, as far as I am concerned, that no expenditure under this would be charged against the project, as the language——

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Is it the understanding of the gentleman from Idaho that this applies only to authorized projects, reclamation projects?

Mr. SMITH. That is my understanding; only projects already under way.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Is it the understanding of the gentleman from Idaho that the Director of Reclamation, if this bill should be enacted into law, would have the power to incur additional obligations in a case, for instance, like the authorization carried in the Swing-Johnson bill, where $165,000,000 had been appropriated for that project?

Mr. CRAMTON. Not yet appropriated, but authorized. May I supplement what I said before as to how this would be charged?

This bill does not carry an appropriation, and the Secretary of the Interior can not make use of this authority unless under some appropriation made by Congress.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I thank the gentleman. That is the case precisely.

Mr. CRAMTON. The existing appropriation for examination is out of the reclamation fund. Other examinations may be made out of the reclamation fund or not.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Let me put the question this way, in order to arrive at a proper understanding: Under the authorization carried in this bill, if an appropriation should follow for the purposes therein designated, would it be possible to employ an economist on such a project as I have indicated, on the so-called Boulder Dam proposition, for which there is an authorization of $165,000,000 to be appropriated?

Mr. CRAMTON. My recollection is that that will depend entirely on the language under which the appropriation is made. My recollection is that the language surrounding that appropriation for investigation each year is such that it would be available for that purpose if the amount of money is available.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I have communicated with the Director of Reclamation, and his answer has been satisfactory. He states now that he could not under any authorization of appropriation that is made in this bill expend any money in the case to which I have directed the gentleman's attention, for the reason that no reclamation project has yet been authorized. If that policy is to be followed, I would have no objection to this legislation.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would not want to dispute with anyone without the language before me, but it is my recollection that that $100,000 a year is used each year for the study of projects not authorized by Congress.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I think the gentleman is right.

Mr. CRAMTON. And, as a matter of fact, they would not care to use from that small fund, because the Boulder Dam is a big project, and they would want to use the money for that particular purpose.

Mr. McFADDEN. I would like to say further, in answer to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] that he has not answered the situation at all. I want to quote here from the letter of Elwood Mead, the commissioner, under date of December 21, 1928, in which he says, writing to Representative SMITH:

The Bureau of Reclamation is now building, or preparing plans for building, dams at Owyhee in Oregon, Easton on the Yakima River in Washington, Deadwood Dam in Idaho, Avalon Dam in New Mexico, is required by law to investigate the feasibility of a dam on the upper Gila River, will soon be called upon to prepare plans for Boulder Dam, and consider the location of dams and dam sites on the Columbia Basin.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say to the gentleman that the proposed Owyhee Dam——

Mr. McFADDEN. I am not referring to the Owyhee Dam. I am referring to the Columbia River Basin.

Mr. CRAMTON. The Owyhee Dam in Oregon, the Deadwood Dam in Idaho, and the Avalon Dam in New Mexico are all now authorized by law. The Boulder Dam is now authorized by law. The Columbia River Basin is not now authorized by law.

Mr. McFADDEN. That is the reason why I am saying what I said in regard to this legislation. I want to see to it that it is not authorized.

Mr. CRAMTON. None of the money mentioned in this bill will be used to investigate any of these unless there is an appropriation or an instruction of some kind.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. The gentleman does not claim that the Boulder Dam legislation authorizes any reclamation?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] says he is going to object anyhow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I am chairman of the committee that reported this bill, and I have had no opportunity to explain it, and request the gentleman to withhold his objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

BOARD OF VISITORS, UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16273) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the membership of the Board of Visitors, United States Military Academy, and for other purposes," approved May 17, 1928.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, some time ago we provided for a Board of Visitors at West Point. We amended it after my objection to its original form by providing that when the board visits West Point to inspect that institution we notify the superintendent of the time of their coming, so that lo and behold! when the visitors come, the band is there to greet them, and the officers and the guard come out to meet them. Now, this board wants to take with it a retinue of secretaries and clerks. This bill provides for the expense of the clerks to accompany the visitors. I can not see any worthy purpose to be subserved by enlarging the purpose of the bill, and I submit now that I shall reserve the right to object.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to permit the Board of Visitors at West Point to take with them the necessary clerical help. Under the provisions of the Board of Visitors bill, which was passed at the last session of Congress, the Subcommittee on Military Affairs of the Committee on Appropriations recommended an appropriation for the Board of Visitors to go to West Point at least once a year to make an inspection, go over the estimates, and have hearings on the projects recommended by the authorities at the United States Military Academy. This year, when the Board of Visitors of the Military Affairs Committee visited West Point the Subcommittee on Appropriations could not go because they were not able to take with them their clerk, which was necessary to conduct the hearings.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. What is to prevent the Committee on Appropriations, when it wants data and figures, from having the witnesses come before it?

Mr. MORIN. But they are authorized to go there and visit the academy, and this will be a more economical procedure.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORIN. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. If this bill is enacted, these clerks will be made members of the visiting committee. In the bill you state that hereafter the Board of Visitors shall consist of certain Members of Congress and necessary clerical help, so that by this language you are making the clerks members of the Board of Visitors.

Mr. MORIN. That is not the intention of the bill.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman consent to the striking out of the provision on page 2, line 13:

And the superintendent of the academy and the members of the Board of Visitors shall be notified of such date by the chairmen of the said committees.

Mr. MORIN. I will not, because that is necessary. How are you going to have the officers on the ground, who are in charge of the project and who are asking for the appropriations, unless you notify them? They might be away on other official business when the Board of Visitors arrives at the academy.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill.

REMOVAL OF SURPLUS SAND FROM THE MILITARY RESERVATION, FORT STORY, VA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14072) to authorize the sale and removal of surplus sand from the military reservation, Fort Story, Va.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of war is hereby authorized to permit, under proper regulations, the sale and removal from the United States Military Reservation, Fort Story, Va., of sand which is not required for the use of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FORT DOUGLAS MILITARY RESERVATION, UTAH

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14924) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant to the city of Salt Lake, Utah, a portion of the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, Utah, for street purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there is no objection to granting this land for the purpose of giving the city a street and maintaining it and using it as a street, but I can not understand why the law itself and the use of the street must be conditioned upon a certain street railway maintaining tracks on that street.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I think I understand the conditions. The particular territory that is affected by the terms of this bill is a small tract of ground at what might be called the blind end of Fifth South Street, in the city of Salt Lake, Utah. The title to a small portion of the ground, as described in the bill, is in the Government and is a part of the Fort Douglas Military Reservation.

Recently the University of Utah, which originally acquired its campus from the Government, and which was originally a part of the reservation, erected a stadium on the southerly portion of its campus, which now makes it important to use this street and which also makes it important that street-car accommodations be maintained there. It is of no value to the city, except for the purpose of accommodating the crowds that want to go to the games, and at this time it would be of as much advantage to the Government as it would be to the University of Utah or to Salt Lake City. Salt Lake City has no objection to any condition which would provide for a reversion of the title to the Government if it is not used for street purposes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman that I have prepared such an amendment.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Because the city will have no use for it when it can not use it as a street.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The gentleman does not get my point. The bill provides:

That said grant shall be subject to the maintenance of street-car tracks on said street by the Utah Light & Traction Co.

Now, suppose at some later date it is desired to have bus service there. The minute the tracks are not maintained there the street would not be an open street any longer.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. The street car company maintains the bus service. We have a trolley bus service.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would the gentleman object to the striking out of the proviso? Salt Lake City can give them their franchise without making this a condition of the grant.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Which proviso?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The very last proviso. The city can give them this franchise to run tracks there, but when you make it the condition that the Government grants this land for street purposes that is all-controlling.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I see no objection to it. If the gentleman sees any objection to that proviso, I have no objection to its going out, because the street car company already has the franchise.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have prepared this amendment:

And provided further, That when said land shall cease to be used and maintained as a street it shall revert back to the United States, and the instrument of conveyance shall recite such reversionary conditions.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I think that will be acceptable.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And strike out the balance of the section?

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. With that understanding, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant and convey to the city of Salt Lake, a municipal corporation of the State of Utah, for street purposes, the land within the extension of Fifth South Street on the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, Utah, more particularly described as follows, to wit: Beginning at the intersection of the north line of Fifth South Street produced and the west line of Fort Douglas United States Military Reservation, said point being 391.48 feet east and 63.37 feet north of the city monument at the intersection of Thirteenth East and Fifth South Streets, thence east 1,320 feet, thence south 131.01 feet, thence west 1,320 feet, thence north 131.01 feet to place of beginning: Provided, That the city of Salt Lake shall construct and maintain a street thereon, without expense to the United States: And provided further, That said grant shall be subject to the maintenance of street-car tracks on said street by the Utah Light & Traction Co. until such time as they are abandoned or removed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 2, line 11, after the colon insert the following: "And provided further, That when said land shall cease to be used and maintained as a street it shall revert back to the United States, and the instrument of conveyance shall recite such reversionary condition."

And strike out the balance of the section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES YORKTOWN SESQUICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the resolution (H. Con. Res. 46) amending section 6 of the House concurrent resolution establishing the United States Yorktown Sesquicentennial Commission.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That section 6 of the House concurrent resolution establishing the United States Yorktown Sesquicentennial Commission be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That the commission shall on or before the 15th day of December, 1929, make a report to the Congress in order that enabling legislation may be enacted."

The concurrent resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15211) to amend section 7 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and in industries; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure," approved February 23, 1917, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to get some information. In the proposed amendment, in line 7, reference is made to section 6 of this act, while the existing law refers to section 17 of this title. I wanted to know if that was intentional or whether it was an oversight. I think we had better let this go over, if no one can give us the information.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] does not seem to be on the floor and I wanted to ask one or two questions about it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

FORD'S THEATER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7206) to establish a national war memorial museum and veterans' headquarters in the building known as Ford's Theater.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair may say for the information of the House that this bill requires three objections.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for two minutes on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman is recognized for two minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, there is an insertion in this proposed legislation to the effect that one of the purposes is to provide a meeting place for the veterans of the Grand Army of the Republic on account of the fact that the building in which they have been holding their meetings is going to be torn down shortly.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, there is any Member in this House on either side of the aisle but what wants to do everything he possibly can to show his consideration for these old veterans. We have shown our desire to do this many times. We all want to help wherever we can these veterans who, we sincerely regret, are rapidly passing away; but, Mr. Speaker, the inquiry I made at the last consent day was whether it is good judgment to appropriate $100,000 to make improvements on a building that, after the improvements are made, would still be unsafe. If I am wrong in this attitude I would be glad to have the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES], for whom I have great respect and whose judgment I value highly, to state whether or not if such improvements are made the building is going to be safe, or whether these old veterans who are going to hold their meetings in this building are going to be in danger.

Mr. YATES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. YATES. I have in my hand a letter from Charles A. Peters, structural engineer of the Bureau of Public Buildings and Public Parks under Col. U. S. Grant. This letter is dated February 2, 1929, and is on the subject of remodeling Ford's Theater.

Let me say that because of the inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], which was a pertinent inquiry and perfectly proper, I asked for an opinion on this subject, and this engineer writes:

MY DEAR MR. YATES: In reply to your inquiry concerning the fireproof character of the Ford's Theater, I wish to state that under the provisions of the bill now pending before Congress, this office contemplates remodeling the building into a modern fireproof structure which will be equal in all respects to the fireproof structures of to-day.

Does that answer the gentleman?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Before I yield, may I say that the statement of the gentleman from Illinois with respect to the inquiry which I addressed to him satisfies me upon that question, and that was the only objection I had in mind.

Mr. YATES. Yes; I so understood.

Mr. DYER. I will reserve my objection so that the gentleman from Massachusetts may make a statement, but I shall not insist upon the objection.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. YATES. I do not understand whether there has been an objection or not.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. DYER. I reserved the right to object for the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DYER. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, may I submit another parliamentary inquiry? At this stage of the proceedings is it necessary to have three objections? Should that be required at this moment or later?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would be required later on.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I brought this matter to the attention of the Members of the House when the Consent Calendar was up before, and although I have been interviewed in the interim by various groups and individuals, the objections which I raised at that time have in no wise been met; in fact, I find that those who have visited me are under a grave misapprehension, and after an explanation on my part have been convinced that I was absolutely right in raising my objection.

It is a sad commentary upon the District of Columbia—not upon the Nation—that it has not provided adequate quarters for the veterans of the Grand Army. This should be done, and I have pledged myself for one to do everything in my power to secure proper quarters for the veterans of the Grand Army and such other veteran organizations as may need it.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. Does not the gentleman think it is somewhat late now?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I do not think so; I think it can be accomplished. However, the best thing to do under the circumstances is to allow this bill to go over without prejudice, and then get together and see if we can not iron out the differences and find some solution of the immediate necessity for the Grand Army veterans and other affiliated bodies. But as far as receding from the position I took previously I refuse to back down one single inch. The same objections are as valid to-day as they were before. I am going to do everything I can to prevent the preservation of this gruesome, morbid, disgraceful monument to the memory of a murderer, rather than a monument to the life and accomplishments of Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the matter be passed over without prejudice in order that we may take it up as soon as possible and see if we can not find some place for the veterans of the Grand Army and other kindred organizations to meet.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. YATES and Mr. BLANTON objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL, Mr. BLACK of Texas, and Mr. HUDDLESTON objected.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have it distinctly understood that there are three objections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The three objections will be stated in the RECORD.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD this letter that I read from the architect, and an additional statement from Colonel Grant. In support of them I want to say one word, if I may have unanimous consent, before the bill is disposed of. I want to say this, and I am very anxious that every Member of the House should consider it. On Saturday Colonel Grant and I and General Clem, a Grand Army veteran, and Mr. Dillon, representative of the veterans of the war with Spain, went over this building inch by inch and then went over the little old building in which are housed the relics of Abraham Lincoln for which this nation paid $50,000.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, it is an absolute shame the way in which the things we bought are now placed. If you will go down in the cellar of that place, you will find a collection there, not belonging to the United States, as I understand it, but to Mr. Oldroyd, who is not to blame, and I do not criticize him, where the touch of one match will absolutely destroy the whole value of the collection. In the community where I live, the home of Abraham Lincoln, we would not think for one moment of leaving those things in the condition they now are.

You object to the bill—I have no criticism of that—but something ought to be done, and done without a moment's delay, to preserve these things. They are not intrinsically valuable, but they could not be replaced in a thousand years.

The matter referred to by Mr. YATES follows:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND PUBLIC PARKS OF THE NATIONAL CAPITAL,
Washington, D. C., February 2, 1929.

Hon. RICHARD YATES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Subject: Remodeling Ford Theater Building.

MY DEAR MR. YATES: In reply to your inquiry concerning the fireproof character of the Ford Theater, I wish to state that under the provisions of the bill now pending before Congress, this office contemplates remodeling the building into a modern fireproof structure which will be equal in all respects to the fireproof structures of to-day.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES A. PETERS, Jr.,
Structural Engineer.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND PUBLIC PARKS OF THE NATIONAL CAPITAL,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1929.

Hon. RICHARD YATES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Subject: Remodeling Ford Theater Building.

MY DEAR MR. YATES: Supplementing my letter of January 29, 1929, and in further reply to your request of January 30, 1929, for my personal opinion in regard to the reconstruction of the Ford Theater proposed by Mr. Rathbone's bill (H. R. 7206), I submit the following:

The first reason for the measure was to provide fireproof and adequate room for the Oldroyd collection of Lincoln relics, which for many years has been in the house in which President Lincoln died, which is a fire trap and has not adequate room for the proper display of the existing collection in such a way that the public can really view it to advantage. The Ford Theater Building, a fireproof building already in the possession of the Government, naturally suggested itself, not only because it was about the right size and had the characteristics desired and because it could be fixed up for the purpose at the minimum cost to the Government, but also because it was the actual site of President Lincoln's martyrdom. Within the walls still existing the tragic shot was fired.

To these reasons should be added another very important one to the public, namely, that the location of the Ford Theater Building is most convenient, while it might be very difficult to find any other equally accessible place in which to give it suitable housing. Now, if the Government's expenditure in buying this collection is to result in the greatest public good, the collection should be accessible to the hotel and business districts in which visitors to Washington find themselves the greater part of the time.

For all these reasons, the convenience of the public, less cost for initial work and maintenance, and the sentimental association, it has appeared to me that the collection could not be more suitably housed than in the Ford Theater Building. While I fully appreciate and in some measure sympathize with Mr. UNDERHILL'S abhorrence of the crime committed in this building and his desire not to emphasize it unnecessarily in the public mind, I believe that it already occupies such an important place in history and is so associated in the public mind with Mr. Lincoln's public services to the Nation, because it brought them to an abrupt close just at the time when the most serious political questions of reconstruction were arising, that I doubt whether any ignoring of the site and physical remnants would tend to efface the memory of the crime. In my opinion the reconstruction of the box and in a general way of the theater auditorium, together with the location in the building of a collection of relics so intimately connected with President Lincoln's life, most suitably enshrines the collection and appropriately summarizes the long period of his great public services by housing them in the surroundings in which his labors for the Nation so tragically ended.

Therefore, when Mr. Rathbone asked me to give him an estimate of the cost of putting the building in condition to house the collection and to make of the Ford Theater itself a Lincoln and Civil War Museum, it seemed quite natural to consider in the matter a partial restoration of the auditorium of the theater, including a replica of the box occupied by President Lincoln on that fatal night. It was thought best not to reproduce the auditorium exactly in all its features; first, because some of the details were not known, and, secondly, because carrying it to its original height would reduce the floor space too much and not leave enough room assured for further accretions to the collection. However, very full information exists about the stage and the box, both in contemporary descriptions and pictures, so that it would be possible to reproduce the box and its surroundings with accuracy. It is noteworthy that since the purchase of the collection by the Government many additional Lincoln relics have been offered, and it may be expected that such offers will be continued. Moreover, Mr. Oldroyd himself has indicated his readiness to donate a considerable additional collection of Civil War memorabilia if the collection is located in the Ford Theater Building under conditions adequately protecting it against fire and other probable damage.

I understood from the chairman of the Commission of Fine Arts that this proposal had the commission's approval, and it seemed to me that it would have a real interest to the public, both from the association with Mr. Lincoln's last moments and from the standpoint of retaining for future generations the appearances and scale of theater of that day.

In this connection Mr. Rathbone was very much interested in the possibility of such an auditorium being used for patriotic exercises on Mr. Lincoln's birthday and similar occasions, as well as affording a more or less consecrated meeting place for patriotic societies. At the present time the Grand Army of the Republic is reduced in numbers and is being moved out by the Government from the quarters it has so long occupied at 1412 Pennsylvania Avenue. To have such a meeting place would be a great help to this organization and would certainly be a privilege much appreciated by the veterans who fought the country's battles under Mr. Lincoln's administration. We must look forward to the time in 15 or 20 years when the Spanish War veterans will be in the same situation as the Grand Army of the Republic are to-day, and at a still further period in the future the American Legion will welcome the opportunity to hold meetings in such a place when its numbers and financial ability to rent larger quarters have diminished. H. R. 7206 provides for such use of the parts of the building not needed for the primary use of housing the now Government-owned exhibit of relics.

Very respectfully,

U. S. GRANT, 3d, Director.

The bill and report is as follows:

H. R. 7206, Seventieth Congress, first session

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

December 13, 1927.

Mr. Rathbone introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed. January 17, 1928, committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 7206) to establish a national war memorial museum and veterans' headquarters in the building known as Ford's Theater

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital is authorized and directed to make such alterations and repairs to the building known as Ford's Theater as may be necessary to permit the use of such building for the following purposes:

(1) As a museum for war relics and other articles of national and patriotic interest; and the director is authorized, in his discretion, to accept on behalf of the United States articles which may be offered as additions to the museum;

(2) As a permanent repository for the Oldroyd collection of Lincoln relics purchased by the United States under authority of the act entitled "An act for the purchase of the Oldroyd collection of Lincoln relics," approved May 11, 1926; and

(3) Under rules and regulations prescribed by the director, as a national headquarters of the Grand Army of the Republic and of other veterans' organizations.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to cover the cost of such alterations and repairs, including the cost of preparing necessary plans, specifications, and estimates (which shall be subject to the approval of the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital and the Commission of Fine Arts), and the cost of personal services.

SEC. 3. Responsibility for the care, maintenance, and protection of such building is hereby transferred from the Secretary of War to the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, and, upon completion of the alterations and repairs authorized to be made by this act, such building shall be known as the national war memorial museum and veterans' headquarters, and shall, together with all exhibits and other articles housed therein, be under the jurisdiction of the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital. There are authorized to be appropriated annually such amounts, to be expended under the direction of such director, as may be necessary for the care, maintenance, and protection of such museum and veterans' headquarters and the exhibits and other articles housed therein.

[H. Rept. No. 299, 70th Cong., 1st sess.]

ESTABLISHMENT OF A LINCOLN MEMORIAL MUSEUM IN BUILDING KNOWN AS FORD'S THEATER

Mr. BEERS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 7206:

The dwelling in which President Lincoln died houses the Oldroyd collection of Lincoln relics which the Government has acquired. The building is not fireproof, and with its valuable contents it may at any time be destroyed. It is not safe for any large crowd of visitors and it is not large enough for the present collection, to say nothing of any additions. Across the street is Ford's Theater, where the President was shot. This was acquired by the Government soon after the tragedy in order that it might never again be used as a theater or put to commercial use. It has of late been used as a Government storehouse, which is not compatible with its tragic associations.

It seems eminently fitting that the Oldroyd collection shall be transferred to the Ford Building after that has been suitably remodeled. Your committee therefore advises the passage of H. R. 7206.

The cost of repairing and remodeling Ford's Theater has been carefully estimated by the Director of Public Buildings and Grounds for the District of Columbia and other responsible persons who state that the total amount required to be expended would not exceed $100,000. It should be borne in mind that in any event considerable repairs would have to be made to the building in the very near future.

Carefully prepared charts and diagrams of the interior of Ford's Theater have also been made, which show the arrangements of the three floors of the building as it would be when remodeled.

Besides the Oldroyd collection of Lincoln relics, numbering several thousand pieces, and now the property of the United States, other Lincoln collections of value and of interest are promised which could be suitably exhibited when Ford's Theater is converted into a national museum.

It seems to the committee that another use, to which Ford's Theater could well be put to the greatest advantage, would be to establish there a headquarters for the veterans of the Grand Army of the Republic. These old soldiers now are with only a very small and unsatisfactory rented space in a building, which is soon to be torn down. Surely in the Nation's Capital some provision should be made for a headquarters for these veterans.

This bill has been indorsed by a large number of organizations of the highest standing, not only of veterans but of other civic and patriotic bodies.

Your committee therefore unanimously recommends that the bill H. R. 7206 do pass.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the bill, and I was hopeful that the Members who objected to the consideration of the bill would withdraw their objections.

If they knew the situation down there and the necessity for an adequate building for the preservation of these memorial articles, I think no man in the House would object.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Why can they not be put in the National Museum?

Mr. BLANTON. They are one collection concerning the life of one man, and the people in my country revere his memory just as do the people in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I call attention to the fact that the gentleman's objection was the one that killed the bill and not ours.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no. I objected to postponing it. I was trying to keep my friend from Massachusetts from killing it by putting it off.

If we could get this bill up and pass it, it would have a chance to pass the Senate and become a law before the Congress ends. Let me say this in behalf of the memory of our departed friend from Illinois, Henry Rathbone. This is his bill. He worked night and day and convinced every man on the committee that this is a good bill and ought to pass. Everyone who knew Mr. Rathbone knows that he was a conscientious and faithful servant of the people, and out of respect to his memory—and he gave his life here in the service of the people—I hope my friends will withdraw their objections and let the bill pass. It is a good bill, and it ought to pass. If a proper building is not given, the first thing we know the sweep of a flame of a match or the fall of a cigarette stub will wipe out that collection. It ought to be preserved.

Mr. YATES. And if not, Mr. Speaker, within a very short time the expenditure of at least $50,000 will be necessary. I think we ought to meet the emergency now before the last soldier marches over the hill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I do not want the House to get a wrong impression from anything I have said or that anyone else has said on the floor of the House. There is no feeling of enmity in my heart against anyone. There is no endeavor upon my part to kill a worthy proposition. It is my opinion that within a week proper measures could be presented to this House which would provide for no greater expenditure than is contemplated here, and the erection, if necessary, of quarters to house these records and to house also the veterans of the Grand Army of the Republic. My objection, and I think the objection of those who joined with me, comes from a feeling of horror that the perpetuation of a building which was the site of a tragedy from which the world has not yet recovered, instead of being a monument and a memento to the life and works and the mercy and kindness of our martyred President, would become a monument to his murderer, John Wilkes Booth. You could not prevent it under the terms of this bill, and if you should consider this bill, it would be almost impossible to so amend the bill upon the floor of the House as to meet the objections which I voice. If anyone is to blame for something which may occur in the future, the blame must rest with those who objected to laying the matter over for a week for further consideration, not to me.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the bill goes over because it has had three objections?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is off the calendar for the present session.

Mr. YATES. What is the present condition of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is on the Union Calendar. The bill is off the Consent Calendar for the balance of this session, but it remains on the Union Calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for a quarter of a minute, to speak to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. If the distinguished ex-Governor of Illinois will get permission of the Speaker at 3 o'clock, when suspensions will be in order, to take up this bill under suspension of the rules, I think he could pass it under suspension.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. YATES. Would a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill be in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would, if the Speaker would recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. YATES. I have already interviewed the Speaker on that point, and he says not to-day.

EQUALIZING PAY OF CERTAIN CLASSES OF OFFICERS, UNITED STATES ARMY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 3569) to equalize the pay of certain classes of officers of the Regular Army.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

DOUBLE PENSION FOR DISABILITY FROM AVIATION DUTIES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 3198) to amend the act of March 3, 1915, granting double pension for disability from aviation duty, Navy or Marine Corps, by inserting the word "Army," so as to read: "Army, Navy, and Marine Corps."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

DENTAL CORPS, UNITED STATES NAVY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 480) for the relief of certain officers of the Dental Corps of the United States Navy.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN LAND IN OREGON

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 4036) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer the control of certain lands in Oregon to the Secretary of the Interior.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer to the control of the Secretary of the Interior, for the use and benefit of certain Indians now using and occupying the land as a fishing camp site, two irregular-shaped parcels of land containing in the aggregate approximately 7⅘ acres, located in lot 1 of section 17 and in lots 1 and 2 of section 20, township 2 north, range 15 east, Willamette meridian, Oregon, originally acquired by the United States as a right of way for a projected boat railway in connection with the improvements of The Dalles-Celilo section of the Columbia River: Provided, That a strip 40 feet wide be reserved from such transfer for a roadway connection between the lock keeper's grounds at Celilo and the Columbia River Highway."

The committee amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13038) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer the control of certain land in Oregon to the Secretary of the Interior.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, this bill is an identical bill to the one just passed, and I ask unanimous consent that this bill lie on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

DELEGATE AND EXHIBIT TO FOURTH WORLD'S POULTRY CONGRESS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 382) to send delegates and an exhibit to the Fourth World's Poultry Congress to be held in England in 1930.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman desires to speak, I do.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides for the sending of delegates and an exhibit to the Fourth International Poultry Congress to be held in Great Britain. It was recommended by the President of the United States in a message to the Congress through the Secretary of State. It was indorsed by the Secretary of Agriculture and by the Director of the Budget. The Committee on Foreign Affairs held hearings and the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Dunlap, appeared before the committee with a number of experts from the Agricultural Department, and the committee, after careful consideration, unanimously reported the joint resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. Every farmer in my district of 400,000 people raises poultry and is interested in it. If the gentleman can tell me how the expenditure of this $40,000 to send a junket over to Great Britain will benefit any one of these farmers in my district, I will withdraw the objection. But it is a waste, a $40,000 waste.

Mr. FISH. It is a very fair question, and what I am trying to do is to persuade the gentleman and show him the reason why every farmer, poultry farmer, in this country will be benefited, and I hope the gentleman will pay strict attention. The United States of America is the biggest poultry raiser in the world. We produce one-third of the eggs and poultry in the world. The farmers of this country have a tremendous commerce in poultry with European and South American nations. We sell vast quantities of poultry and eggs to Europe and South America. We ought to send expert poultry men and an exhibit from the United States when every other nation in the world is ready and glad of the opportunity to exhibit their poultry products. This resolution only provides for $15,000 for delegates and the balance, amounting to $25,000, for an exhibit.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. FISH. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. Did my distinguished colleague from New York attend the Interparliamentary Union in this Chamber when legislators from the peoples of the world came here?

Mr. FISH. I regret to say I was unable to.

Mr. BLANTON. There was not much good accomplished because the gentleman was not here.

Mr. FISH. I could not quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman raised poultry himself?

Mr. FISH. Oh, yes. Let me go on and try to persuade my good friend from Texas that this is in the interest of the trade and commerce of the United States, and particularly of those people who raise poultry and eggs and sell poultry and eggs in foreign nations. It is very important that we have exhibits at the Fourth World's Poultry Congress, and if we fail to it may seriously hamper our poultry exports and be the cause of losing our foreign markets. Assistant Secretary Dunlap persuaded all the members of the committee, including the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], that it was of the utmost importance to our poultry trade with foreign lands for us to take an active part in the proposed congress. I would like him to answer the question and state that this resolution is in the interest of the poultry raisers and the commerce of the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The showing made was certainly satisfactory to us, although it may not be to the gentleman from Texas. The point was made that the conferences heretofore held have resulted in very considerable good in the way of investigation of the general subject—the improvement of breeds—that has been of benefit to the poultry raisers of the United States.

And then another thing, if I may interrupt my distinguished friend from Texas, this interesting fact was brought out, that the poultry business of this country in volume and in value stands near the very head of the list of agricultural products.

Mr. FISH. Fifth on the list. It comes in after cotton. First come dairy products, next corn, then swine, cotton, and poultry.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I am afraid that when we spend this $40,000 the junketeers that we send over to Great Britain will be like the gentleman from New York was when the Interparliamentary Union met here; they will be somewhere else. I venture to say that every farmer in my district knows more about poultry in a minute than these junketeers will know as long as they live.

Mr. FISH. This resolution aims to promote sales abroad, not junketing.

Mr. BLANTON. I am constrained to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ROCK CREEK AND POTOMAC PARKWAY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16209) to enable the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission, established by act of March 4, 1913, to make slight changes in the boundaries of said parkway by excluding therefrom and selling certain small areas, and including other limited areas, the net cost not to exceed the total sum already authorized for the entire project.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the idea I have is that once park land, always park land. If the sponsors of the bill are willing to strike out, on page 2, the proviso that permits the selling of land to owners of adjacent property, I shall not object. Otherwise I will object.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I am merely, of course, the transmitter of this bill. It is brought in as framed by the counsel for the commission in question, but it appeals to my judgment because only very small areas are involved and this measure will enable us to make the improvements without added expense to the Government.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. My understanding is that the lands which this bill will exclude are not lands that have been acquired as yet. They are lands that are within the boundaries proposed to be acquired, but they are not yet acquired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is no objection to excluding them, but then it provides that the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital may dispose of the lands so excluded, either by public auction or at a fair appraised value, or to the owners of adjacent property at a price not less than that paid for it. My objection is at any time against disturbing any land in park areas.

Mr. LUCE. It seems to me this should be left to the good faith and judgment of such men as Colonel Grant and his associates.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What are we here for?

Mr. LUCE. We are here so far as possible to exercise judgment about important questions of policy.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have had some experience with parks in my city. We have slightly more parks in my little town than you have here in Washington. I yield my judgment to none in the belief that it is wise never to dispose of park areas.

Mr. SIMMONS. I agree with the gentleman that we ought not to part with park lands in the District, but it occurs to me it might be wise to exchange some of these small areas for others.

Mr. LUCE. In the 10 years of my tenure here I have wondered why this parkway was not completed. The delay, if continued, may postpone its completion beyond the time of the gentleman's service and mine. Every such meticulous point as this further delays the completion of an exceedingly desirable public improvement.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I agree with the policy to exclude such lands as are not now within the proposed area, but not to exclude lands that are within that area.

Mr. CRAMTON. As I understand, the gentleman would not object to the bill if the last two provisos were stricken out?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Only the one I mentioned.

Mr. CRAMTON. The last would go with the other.

Mr. LUCE. I had intended to ask for the substitution of the bill from the Senate which is now before the House. It is exactly the same bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Can the gentleman support my amendment?

Mr. LUCE. I can not consistently support it, but I will not oppose it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not want to take arbitrary judgment on that, but I submit it to the House and am prepared to yield gracefully.

Mr. LUCE. I will keep still, but I will not urge the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the House is largely guided by the gentleman's good judgment.

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman pays me too high a compliment in thinking that when I keep silent I still have influence in the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I was through that but a few moments ago. If the gentleman will support my amendment and make that a consideration of the bill, I shall not object.

Mr. LUCE. I am sure no gentleman will ask another Member to support something on the floor of the House against his better judgment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. DENISON. May I ask the gentleman from New York the ground of his objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not think the report shows a sufficient reason for extending the time.

Mr. DENISON. In what respect?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Generally. There are several of these bills that I am going to object to.

Mr. DENISON. I was asking particularly as to this bill. Is there anything the committee could do to remove the gentleman's objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. Reduce the extension period from three years to one year.

Mr. DENISON. It is only the completion of the bridge that is extended three years. The general law allows one year to begin and three years to complete. We merely extend both periods one year. I thought the gentleman has misread that. We never extend the period of beginning three years or two years; we never extend it over one year in any case. We just extend both dates.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But you have not done that in this bill.

Mr. DENISON. This is merely extending the time for the completion of the bridge. The bridge is already begun.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is this bridge begun?

Mr. MILLER. No; not the actual construction. If it was, of course, we would not be here with the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly.

Mr. MILLER. But this bridge is to connect two parts of the city of Bremerton and the city of Bremerton is the site of the United States Navy Yard and the bridge will be used a great deal by employees of the yard, and will facilitate matters to a great extent. All the preliminary work has been done.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it the purpose of this bill that the bridge here must be completed in three years?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman will admit that this bill is different from the other bills?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; because the others only ask for an extension of the time of completion and not the time of beginning.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. With that understanding, the objection is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for completing the construction of the bridge across Port Washington Narrows, within the city of Bremerton, State of Washington, authorized by the act of Congress, entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to W. E. Buell, of Seattle, Wash., to construct a bridge across Port Washington Narrows, within the city of Bremerton, in the State of Washington," approved June 14, 1926, be, and the same is hereby, extended three years from the date of approval hereof.

Page 1, line 5, after the word "Orleans," insert the words "and Gretna, La."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the word "the" and insert the words "this act shall be null and void unless the actual."

Page 2, line 4, after the word "shall," strike out the word "not," and in the same line, after the word "commenced," strike out the words "until the consent of the proper authorities of the Dominion of Canada for the erection of the structure shall have been obtained" and insert "within one year and completed within three years from the date of approval hereof."

BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC RIVER NEAR GREAT FALLS

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. I withhold it.

Mr. DENISON. May I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin on what ground he objects?

Mr. SCHAFER. I would refer the gentleman to the debate on the floor of this House when the original bill was passed. I opposed that bill and forced a roll call under the parliamentary situation. I am opposed to the bill under consideration for the reasons given at that time, and I am going to do everything I can to prevent its enactment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin reserve his objection long enough for me to make a suggestion in the RECORD for the consideration of those who are interested in the bill? The bill came up for consideration and I had in mind to ask approval of the following amendment:

Page 2, line 9, before the word "been" insert "and as may be approved by the National Planning and Parking Commission."

That is to say, if we are going to give the bridge company the use of Government land, I think the views of the National Parking and Planning Commission ought to be secured because we are hopeful of having this as a parkway area along the Potomac, and it would be undesirable for the bridge company to do anything that might conflict.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the original bill provide for that?

Mr. CRAMTON. No; it does not, because this is a new and separate section. When it comes up I would like an opportunity to offer the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER AT SIOUX CITY, IOWA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14460) authorizing the Iowa-Nebraska Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Sioux City, Iowa.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Reserving the right to object, I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of Members to this bill. It shows what a community can do with reference to the construction of a toll bridge. The author, Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska, has made every attempt to protect the people's interest; further, a sinking fund is created, the tolls go into the sinking fund, and in the end the bridge will be declared free. I commend this bill to Members who find it necessary to introduce bridge bills and hope they will follow the example set by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD], see that the municipality constructs the bridge, thus eliminating the professional promoter, who seeks to exploit the Federal highway system.

While I am on my feet I want to say that I have looked over the bills reported by the committee and now on the calendar, and I am pleased to notice that the committee made two important changes in the bills. One of the changes refers to the time that the municipality or State can take over the bridge, and the second is a new section, a very important section, which provides that the contract must be let by competitive bidding. This is going to result in lowering the cost of construction. I want to ask the chairman of the subcommittee on bridge bills [Mr. DENISON] if the committee will not also consider in the future some kind of an amendment which will provide that, after a reasonable return is received by the owners of the bridge from tolls, the balance of the money be placed in a sinking fund to retire the bonds so that in the end it will become a free bridge. I think that is an important amendment to add, and it would remove a great deal of objection to these bills. It would give assurance the bridge would eventually become free and reduce the cost to the municipality or State when the time comes to take control under the recapture clause.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. With pleasure.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman has taken a great deal of interest in bridge bills. I want to say that this bill is not an ideal bill. It provides for a sinking fund generally, but it does not provide how much dividends shall be paid before the payment is made into the sinking fund to amortize the amount. It is one step forward, but it is not an ideal bill.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It is a step in the right direction and the author should be commended for his efforts. If this project succeeds it can be held up as an example. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD] tells me construction will start shortly after the consent of Congress is granted. They are trying to eliminate the promoter and he should be eliminated. The gentleman from New York, who is always rendering splendid service, deserves a great deal of credit for the interest he has shown in private toll bridge bills. His suggestions are always worthy of consideration, and they do receive consideration. Let this project be tried out. A more ideal bill will probably soon follow.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield to me? I want to suggest to the gentleman that, while the bill may not be perfect, it is just as perfect as in my wisdom I was capable of making it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I believe that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. If the gentleman will observe closely, he will discover that the committee has inserted in the bill a clause which the gentleman has never seen in any other bill, protecting the interest of all of the people, by providing that a commission of the mayors of the municipalities at either end of the bridge shall see to it, just what the gentleman desires, namely, that this money shall be paid in to meet the cost of the bridge on the earliest day possible.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not think there is any objection to the gentleman's bill.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Then I subside. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H. R. 14460, Seventieth Congress, second session

A bill (H. R. 14460) authorizing the Iowa-Nebraska Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Sioux City, Iowa

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to facilitate interstate commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes the Iowa-Nebraska Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Sioux City, Iowa, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the Iowa-Nebraska Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said Iowa-Nebraska Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. After the completion of such bridge as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of Nebraska, the State of Iowa, any public agency, or political subdivision of either of such States, within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of either of such States governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of 20 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion costs, not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interests in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 5. The Iowa-Nebraska Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall have the right, in addition to the other rights hereafter granted, to issue first-mortgage bonds in an amount sufficient to pay the cost of the construction of said bridge, the acquisition of necessary real estate and interest in real estate and improvements placed thereon and cost of financing and promotion not to exceed 10 per cent of the total actual cost of construction, acquisition of real estate and interest in real estate and improvements, which bonds shall run not to exceed 20 years from date thereof, and be callable after 5 years at 105 per cent of par value and accrued interest; and to provide therefor, the said Iowa-Nebraska Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall set up and create a sinking fund out of the net earnings of said bridge for the redemption of said first-mortgage bonds, which shall be so amortized that not less than 8 per cent of said bonds may be retired each year after the fifth year at the callable rate of 105 per cent, and accrued interest: Provided, That at any time after the expiration of the term of said bonds, or their retirement as herein provided, and the payment of all operating and other expenses to such date, said bridge with all rights and easements and rights of way thereto appertaining shall become the property of either or both of the States of Iowa and Nebraska, provided they shall pass proper legislation providing for the maintenance and upkeep of said bridge and maintain and operate the same either as a toll-free bridge or by the imposition of only so much tolls as shall provide for the actual maintenance and operation, and in the event that the said States or neither of them shall desire to assume ownership and jurisdiction, then any county or municipality in either or both of said States shall, upon passing or securing suitable and proper legislation for the maintenance and operation of said bridge, be entitled to assume ownership and jurisdiction thereof and the Iowa-Nebraska Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall convey said bridge and all real estate and rights or interest in real estate appurtenant thereto, to such State, county, or municipality qualifying themselves to assume ownership and the operation and maintenance thereof, conditioned that same shall be a toll-free bridge or only such toll imposed as may cover the actual costs of operation and maintenance.

SEC. 6. The Iowa-Nebraska Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall within 90 days after the completion of such bridge file with the Secretary of War and with the highway departments of the States of Nebraska and Iowa, a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, and upon request of the highway department of either of such States shall, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of construction, financing, and promoting such bridge. For the purposes of such investigation the said Iowa-Nebraska Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 5 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 7. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to the Iowa-Nebraska Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 8. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"That in order to facilitate interstate commerce, improve the postal service, and provide for military and other purposes, the Iowa-Nebraska Amortized Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Sioux City, Iowa, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters,' approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

"SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the Iowa-Nebraska Amortized Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

"SEC. 3. The said Iowa-Nebraska Amortized Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

"SEC. 4. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of Nebraska, the State of Iowa, any public agency or political subdivision of either of such States, within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor by purchase, or by condemnation, or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of either of such States governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If such bridge is so acquired or taken over, the amount of the purchase price to be paid therefor, or in case of condemnation or expropriation the amount of damages to be allowed therefor, shall be the amount of bonds, debentures, or other evidences of indebtedness actually issued in payment for the bridge and its approaches and improvements and outstanding at the time of such purchase or condemnation, with the accrued interest thereon.

"SEC. 5. If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the States or public agencies or political subdivisions thereof, or by either of them, as provided in section 4 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

"SEC. 6. Upon the completion of such bridge a commission shall be created composed of three members, one of whom shall be appointed by the mayor of South Sioux City, Nebr., one by the mayor of Sioux City, Iowa, and one by the directors of the Iowa-Nebraska Amortized Free Bridge Co.; it shall be the duty of the commission to supervise the collection of tolls and to authorize and audit all expenditures of money received from the collection of tolls; it shall be their duty to see that all revenues received from the bridge, except such amounts as may be necessary for the repair, operation, and maintenance, under economical management of the bridge, shall be paid into the sinking fund and used for the amortization of the outstanding indebtedness incurred for the construction or improvement of the bridge. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, the bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, and the Iowa-Nebraska Amortized Free Bridge Co., its successors or assigns, shall thereupon convey, by proper instrument of conveyance, all right, title, and interest in said bridge and its approaches, to the State of Nebraska and the State of Iowa, jointly, or to the highway departments thereof, if such States or their highway departments shall agree to accept and to maintain and operate the same; if such States or their highway departments refuse to agree to accept and maintain and operate said bridge as a free bridge, then the Iowa-Nebraska Amortized Free Bridge Co. shall convey said bridge to either of such States, or to either of the counties thereof in which such bridge is located in whole or in part, as shall agree to accept and to maintain and operate the same as a free bridge.

"SEC. 7. The Iowa-Nebraska Amortized Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall within 90 days after the completion of such bridge file with the Secretary of War and with the highway departments of the States of Nebraska and Iowa, a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, the actual financing and promotion costs, and the amount of bonds, debentures, or other evidences of indebtedness issued in connection with the construction of such bridge. The Secretary of War may, and upon request of the highway department of either of such States shall, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of construction, financing, and promoting such bridge. For the purpose of such investigation the said Iowa-Nebraska Amortized Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 5 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

"SEC. 8. Neither the Iowa-Nebraska Amortized Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, or any officer or stockholder thereof, shall directly or indirectly, own or have any interest in any other bridge competing for business with the bridge authorized by this act.

"SEC. 9. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to the Iowa-Nebraska Amortized Free Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person:

Provided, That no such transfer shall be made to any competing bridge company or to any person or persons interested directly or indirectly in any competing bridge.

"SEC. 10. All contracts that may be made in connection with the construction of the bridge authorized by this act, and which shall involve the expenditure of more than $5,000 shall be let by competitive bidding. Such contracts shall be advertised a reasonable time in some newspaper of general circulation published in the vicinity of such bridge; sealed bids shall be required and the contracts shall be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder. A verified copy or abstract of all bids received and of the bid or bids accepted shall be furnished to the highway departments of the States of Iowa and Nebraska. A failure to comply in good faith with the provisions of this section shall render null and void any contract entered into in violation thereof, and the Secretary of War may, after hearing, order the suspension of all work upon such bridge until the provisions of this section shall have been fully complied with.

"SEC. 11. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the title—to insert the word "Amortized" after the word "Nebraska" in the first line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes to reply to questions asked by the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has submitted to me as chairman of the subcommittee certain questions which I feel ought to be answered. Our committee is now inserting in these bridge bills authorizing the construction of toll bridges by private parties a provision to the effect that if the bridge authorized is constructed by contracts, that all such contracts shall be let by public bidding, after being properly advertised, and that the contracts shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder. That provision is inserted in order to prevent what some fear exists at times—that is, the padding of the cost of bridges or an undue enlarging of the cost of bridges. Of course, it is of importance to the public that the cost of these bridges be kept as low as possible, because the public eventually pays for them by the payment of tolls; or if the State takes them over under the recapture clause, then the cost of the bridge has to be taken into consideration in fixing the amount of damage to be paid. Therefore, in the interest of the public we thought it wise to insert this paragraph providing for safeguarding the letting of contracts for the construction of bridges to be constructed by private parties. We propose to insert that paragraph in all such bills.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Is there any provision in any of these bills for the supervision of the construction of the bridge originally?

Mr. DENISON. There is not.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the gentleman believe that if the bridge is to be recaptured the bill should have a provision with reference to supervision of its construction as well as a provision for safeguarding the letting of contracts?

Mr. DENISON. I do not believe that we can work out a provision of that kind that would be satisfactory. In the first place, we would not know whom to let have the power of supervision. In the next place, we have to depend to some extent upon the people who construct the bridge constructing it as carefully and as cheaply as possible.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true that placing these bridges up for open bids is of but little consequence unless we have a plan for construction? The whole purpose of it may be defeated unless the bridge is properly constructed. That, it seems to me, is one of the most important things that we have to contend with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for one minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHALMERS. Would it be possible to put in these bridge bills a provision that the municipalities should have a stated time within which to take advantage of the license before the private party could go ahead with the contract?

Mr. DENISON. The policy of our committee is that before a bill is reported authorizing a bridge to be constructed by a private party, the committee must have a showing from the Member of Congress who filed the bill to the effect that the municipality or State or county will not or can not construct the bridge. We do not report a private bridge bill unless that showing is made.

Mr. CHALMERS. In the bridge that I am interested in just recently there has come up the possibility of the city being interested in its construction.

Mr. DENISON. If the city wants to build the bridge, if they will get the gentleman to introduce the bill, we will report it at any time and give it preference over a private bill.

Mr. BURTNESS. And not only that, but, if so desired, sometimes the committee will refuse to report the bill giving consent to private parties.

Mr. DENISON. Yes. The policy of the committee is to give preference to public authority always.

In answer to the other question submitted by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] I wish to say that our committee has not yet been able to prepare any form for a bridge franchise which would provide for the bridge becoming free upon the repayment of the cost of the bridge and a reasonable profit where the bridge is constructed by private parties with private capital. Of course, if Congress should provide such a franchise, and if such a franchise would be acceptable to those who are willing to invest their money in bridges, such an arrangement would be very desirable and would meet the approval of our committee. But we have never yet been informed of any private capital that would be willing to invest in bridges under such conditions.

There is always some hazard to an investment in a bridge. There is a chance of loss. Bridges are expensive structures. When constructed over larger streams, their cost runs into millions. Those who invest in them take some chance on getting their original investment returns. They always take a chance on having the bridge injured or destroyed by irresponsible parties or by storms or floods. Before capital will invest in such structures, there must be a reasonable assurance, not only of a return of the capital invested, but of a reasonable profit thereon while invested. The committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will give consideration to any suggestions from any Members of the House, or from any other source, that may be offered with a view to safeguarding the interests of the public. We are considering bills now pending which provide for a general revision of the bridge laws. But such legislation can not be passed during this session. Let me say to the gentleman from Missouri, who has been very much interested in this subject, that under the adopted policy of our committee, franchises for toll bridges are not granted to private parties until a showing has been made to the effect that the State or States or the counties or municipalities in which the bridge is located will not or can not build a public bridge. If the State, county, or municipality requests a franchise for the construction of a bridge, our committee will grant it and will refuse to grant a franchise to private parties to construct a bridge at the same location. All private toll-bridge franchises contain a provision for recapture by the public whenever it is desired to take them over for the purpose of making them free; and after a certain number of years we are providing for a limited measure of damages if condemnation is necessary in order to acquire title to the bridge. Our committee is now shortening the time after which the limited measure of damages will apply. Generally speaking this time will be at five years after the completion of the bridge. In the case of more expensive structures over the larger waterways, the period will be 10 years. So that in all franchises for privately owned toll bridges, the State or States, or the counties or municipalities in which such bridges are located, may purchase them or condemn them, and thereby acquire them by the payment of the actual value of the physical structure at the time they are taken over, no allowance being made for earning power, or going value, or prospective profits. This recapture provision will, we think, entirely safeguard the public and permit the States or the counties to acquire any toll bridge for a fair valuation whenever the States or counties desire to get rid of the tolls and make such bridges free. I feel sure the gentleman from Missouri, and others who are interested in this subject, will, upon careful consideration of these changes in the forms of bridge franchises, and these additional safeguards of the public interests, not feel justified in objecting to the consideration of such bills by the House, but will be willing to let them be submitted to the House for such consideration as the House wishes to give them.

DECLARATIONS OF INTENTION IN NATURALIZATION PROCEEDINGS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16440) relating to declarations of intention in naturalization proceedings.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first subdivision of section 4 of the act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization and provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States," approved June 29, 1906, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"First. He shall declare on oath before the clerk of any court authorized by this act to naturalize aliens, or his authorized deputy, in the district in which such alien resides, two years at least prior to his admission, and after he has reached the age of 18 years, that it is bona fide his intention to become a citizen of the United States and to reside permanently therein, and that he will, before being admitted to citizenship, renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty, and particularly, by name, to the prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty of which the alien may be at the time of admission a citizen or subject. Such declaration shall set forth the name, age, occupation, personal description, place of birth, last foreign residence, the date of arrival, the name of the vessel, if any, in which he came to the United States, and the present place of residence in the United States of said alien."

SEC. 2. Section 1 of this act shall take effect 60 days after its enactment. A declaration of intention made before the expiration of such 60-day period, whether before or after the enactment of this act, in which appears an erroneous statement of allegiance, shall not be held invalid for such cause if the error was due to a change of political boundaries, or the creation of new countries, or the transfer of territory from one country to another. Nothing in this section shall permit the reinstatement of a petition for naturalization dismissed for such cause, but in such a case the benefits of this section may be obtained by filing a new petition before the expiration of the period of validity of the declaration of intention.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS SANDUSKY BAY, SANDUSKY, OHIO

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I have objected to a good many of these bridge bills. However, I now ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 16208) authorizing the Cedar Point Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Sandusky Bay at or near Sandusky, Ohio, a bill introduced by our charming colleague from Ohio [Mr. BEGG], who is about to leave us, and who is anxious to have this bill passed. It is an emergency measure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states that it is an emergency that is involved?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. So I understand.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote interstate commerce, improve the postal service, and provide for military and other purposes, the Cedar Point Bridge Co., a corporation organized under the laws of Ohio, of Sandusky, Erie County, Ohio, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Sandusky Bay, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near a point on what is known as Big Island on the southerly shore of Sandusky Bay in the city of Sandusky, Ohio, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of Ohio, any political subdivision thereof within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation in accordance with the laws of such State governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of 20 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion cost not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interests in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 3. If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the State of Ohio, or by any municipality or other political subdivision or public agency thereof under the provisions of section 2 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

The Secretary of War may, and at the request of the Highway Department of the State of Ohio shall, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge; for the purpose of such investigation the said Cedar Point Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The SPEAKER. Three hundred and one Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of protecting from disintegration and of improving, beautifying, and preserving the Abraham Lincoln National Park or Reservation established under the act entitled "An act to accept a deed or gift or conveyance from the Lincoln Farm Association, a corporation, to the United States of America, of land near the town of Hodgenville, county of Larue, State of Kentucky, embracing the homestead of Abraham Lincoln and the log cabin in which he was born, together with the memorial hall inclosing the same; and further to accept an assignment or transfer of an endowment fund of $50,000 in relation thereto," approved July 17, 1916 (U. S. C. title 16, secs. 211–214), the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to provide for (1) the improvement of such existing roadways, walks, and buildings in such park or reservation; and (2) the planting of such trees, plants, and shrubbery; the construction of such additional roadways, walks, and buildings, and of such fences, parking spaces, drainage structures, culverts, and bridges; and the making of such other improvements, as in his judgment may be necessary for the preservation, beautification, and protection from disintegration of such park or reservation, including the log cabin in which Abraham Lincoln was born and the memorial hall inclosing the same, and which may serve to render such park or reservation convenient for the appropriate use and enjoyment by the public.

SEC. 2. There is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the provisions of section 1 of this act; and authorization is also hereby given for such appropriations as may, in the future, be deemed necessary for the proper protection, preservation, care, maintenance, and operation of the said national park or reservation, including the salaries and compensation of a superintendent and other needed employees.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. CRAMTON. I demand a second.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THATCHER].

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, in a few days we will celebrate in this country, and there will be celebrated throughout the civilized world, the one hundred and twentieth anniversary of the birth of one of the great spirits of this Nation. Down in Larue County, Ky., in what in February, 1809, was Hardin County, Ky., there was born Abraham Lincoln—born under conditions as humble, perhaps, as those which surrounded the birth of the Man of Sorrows. Here [exhibiting it] is a picture of the log cabin in which he was born. In the course of years, culminating in 1907, Robert J. Collier and other public-spirited people in this country, made up a private subscription fund, about $250,000 net—over $300,000 in all—for the purpose of purchasing the old Lincoln farm and building on this sacred spot an enduring memorial to this great man. The farm of his birth, 110½ acres, once owned by Thomas Lincoln, the father, was purchased by the Lincoln Farm Association, of which former Gov. Joseph W. Folk, of Missouri, was president. In 1916, during the administration of President Wilson, there was enacted by the Congress a bill or measure authorizing the acceptance, free of cost, by the United States, of this land and this memorial structure housing this log cabin, to be preserved through all the future; preserved for the benefit and enjoyment of all of our people, without cost or charge to them in the way of fees for the right to view this memorial, this farm, and this little cabin. Here [exhibiting it] is a picture of the memorial hall, a beautiful marble structure costing something like $250,000.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman inform us as to the amount of land?

Mr. THATCHER. One hundred and ten and one-half acres. At the same time the Lincoln Memorial Association conveyed, by assignment, to the Government of the United States $50,000 in gilt-edged securities as an endowment fund, so that the interest or income derived therefrom might go toward the maintenance of this farm and this memorial, and toward the preservation from disintegration of this log cabin.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. THATCHER. I will.

Mr. GARBER. Has it adequate highway communications to and from the place?

Mr. THATCHER. There is the Jackson Highway, a Federal aid project, running north and south through the farm, but there is no adequate approach to the memorial itself. Now, the Congress in 1916, by the act of July 17 of that year, placed all of this property under the administrative supervision of the Secretary of War.

The Secretary of War in the past has construed the law, as we understand it, as not being sufficiently broad to authorize the expenditure of the money necessary to construct the needed approach road and the other necessary improvements, and to take care of the property as it needs to be taken care of, with the result that during these 13 years that it has been under governmental control and ownership, with only the $2,000 of income being expended for caretaking, the farm has been growing up in bushes and briars, gullies are being washed, and the plaza in front of this marble memorial is at times covered with silt and mud to a depth of several inches. Also, the little spring where Lincoln as a boy drank, and which was the water supply of the Lincoln household, is being fouled and flooded in the rainy seasons. There are on the farm no adequate roads nor any parking spaces, and no conveniences have been provided for the visiting public. Yet, this is one of the greatest shrines in the country, and the Government of the United States, having taken over this property, is under, at least, a moral obligation to provide for its maintenance.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. THATCHER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. What money has the Federal Government expended on this property to date?

Mr. THATCHER. No money, except the $2,000 a year; and two years ago there was appropriated $5,000 for work on the approach road; but it has been inadequate.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The $2,000 was interest on the trust fund. No Federal money has been expended?

Mr. THATCHER. No; except a portion of the $5,000.

Mr. MOORMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THATCHER. Certainly.

Mr. MOORMAN. The $5,000 which the gentleman referred to has not yet been all expended?

Mr. THATCHER. Only a portion of it.

A few months ago the Quartermaster General had a survey made of this whole situation, which, I say in all candor to this House, is a national disgrace because of the conditions that prevail there. The Quartermaster General in his survey found various needs to be taken care of in the way of roads, in the way of rest houses and comfort stations. And yet this is one of the great national shrines of America.

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THATCHER. Yes.

Mr. WURZBACH. Has any suggestion been made or any estimate made by the Budget Bureau?

Mr. THATCHER. Some weeks ago the Secretary of War submitted a request for something more than $80,000 for needed improvements, but no action has been taken on that request. I have talked with the Director of the Budget, and he thinks there ought to be a basic measure or an authorization passed to take care of this situation.

The purpose of this bill is to give to Congress a clear-cut authority to make the appropriation. This bill so provides. If it becomes a law there must be submitted through the regular channels, under our Budget system, an estimate of the War Department, emanating from the Quartermaster General. That is because that is where the administrative care of this property now resides—with the Quartermaster General.

Mr. MOORMAN. As to roads, will you kindly explain the condition within the grounds?

Mr. THATCHER. From the Jackson Highway to the Lincoln Memorial there is a little approach road, in bad condition, about 8 feet wide. Now, remember, this is one of the greatest places in the country where people want to go, and yet they can not go under the present unfavorable conditions which there obtain.

Mr. MOORMAN. Is it not a fact that a visiting party tried to get in not long ago and could not get in on account of the road?

Mr. THATCHER. Yes. That is the fact.

Mr. MOORMAN. And thousands of people desire to visit that place?

Mr. THATCHER. Yes. It is true that thousands of the American people desire to visit that place. If there is any spot where people can draw the lessons and inspirations of patriotism, it is there at the Lincoln farm.

Mr. MOORMAN. Is it not a further fact that the Government, by having taken this property over, has prevented the Lincoln Memorial Association from functioning as a private institution to meet the situation?

Mr. THATCHER. Exactly. This property was deeded to the Government of the United States together with an endowment fund of $50,000; and President Wilson and the Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, as appears of record in the House Committee on Military Affairs, by which committee this bill was unanimously reported, set forth the conditions of acceptance in a formal instrument executed by them on August 18, 1916.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. THATCHER. Now the statement is made that under basic law we have the authority to make the needed appropriation. Whether that be true or not, we are not getting the appropriation; the appropriation is not being made, and an estimate has not been submitted by the Budget Bureau. I am not criticizing the Budget Bureau; but the enactment of this measure will place beyond peradventure, the right, on the part of Congress, to make these appropriations.

Mr. MOORMAN. Is it not a fact that the Government now has this $300,000 property?

Mr. THATCHER. Yes. It was the idea that the Government would preserve and care for it. What we want to do is to make the situation clear, so that there will be no question on the part of the Secretary of War, or on the part of the Director of the Budget of the right to recommend the required appropriations. [Applause and cries of "vote!"]

Mr. Speaker, the proposed legislation is of an emergency character. For nearly 13 years the United States has held the ownership and exercised control of this property. It appears that through all this period the War Department has been under the impression that it was limited in funds for maintenance and improvement purposes to the interest or income on the $50,000 endowment fund to which I have already referred. During all these years, so far as I am advised, the War Department has not submitted to Congress, or to the Budget, until recently, any estimate of funds needed in the way of appropriations for any of these improvements. This nonaction appears to have been based upon the suggestion I have just indicated—namely, that War Department officials were under the impression that additional funds could not be appropriated except under some further legislative authority therefor.

The pending bill was introduced after its proponents had conferred with War Department officials, and it was not pressed until inquiry had been made of the Budget officials in relation to the subject. A month ago or more the Secretary of War finally submitted to the Bureau of the Budget an estimate for $80,000 for the indicated improvements; but this estimate has not been submitted by the Bureau of the Budget to Congress, and my information is that the Budget officers believe that further legislative authorization is required upon which to base the proposed expenditures for these greatly needed improvements.

The act of 1916 contains no specific provisions authorizing the making of appropriations for any purpose. The pending measure contains the necessary appropriation authorizations for all needed purposes.

The House Committee on Military Affairs unanimously reported in favor of the enactment of this bill, and an identical bill introduced in the Senate (S. 5228) received the like favorable report by the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate. Under leave given me I herewith include as a part of my remarks on the pending measure a copy of the letter written by the Secretary of War to the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate giving approval of this measure, and indicating that it had been submitted to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, who advised "that same is not in conflict with the financial program of the President." Also, under the leave thus given me, I include as a part of what I have to say on this subject certain extracts from the hearings before the House Military Affairs Committee, and from that committee's report, on the pending bill. The letter from the Secretary of War to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs was dated January 21, 1929, and is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 21, 1929.

Hon. D. A. REED,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR REED: In compliance with your request of January 16, 1929, I am pleased to submit the following report on S. 5228:

The subject of the proposed legislation is "To provide for the improvement and preservation of the land and buildings of the Abraham Lincoln National Park or Reservation."

The applicable provision of existing law is an act approved July 17, 1916 (39 Stat. 385), which provides for the acceptance of a deed of gift or conveyance from the Lincoln Farm Association, a corporation, to the United States of America, of land near the town of Hodgenville, county of Larue, State of Kentucky, embracing the homestead of Abraham Lincoln and the log cabin in which he was born, together with the memorial hall inclosing the same; and, further, to accept an assignment or transfer of an endowment fund of $50,000 in relation thereto.

Under the provisions of the act approved July 17, 1916, the Government, under an agreement entered into August 18, 1916, took over the birthplace of Abraham Lincoln near Hodgenville, Ky., comprising a 110-acre farm, together with the improvements made thereon, and including a $200,000 marble memorial which was constructed to inclose the log cabin in which Lincoln was born; also a trust fund of $46,000 invested in bonds.

Since the time the Lincoln farm and memorial were taken over by the Government in 1916 the interest on the trust fund, which amounts at present to $2,040 per annum, has been expended in the maintenance and upkeep of the farm and memorial, and with the exception of $5,000, which was appropriated for expenditure during the current fiscal year, no other Government funds have been used for the maintenance and upkeep of this reservation. During the past year a study and investigation of the existing conditions and needed improvements was made, which shows that the farm and memorial are in a badly run-down condition and that approximately the amount of money authorized to be appropriated by the proposed bill will be needed to place them in a condition commensurate with their importance as a national shrine. These improvements can not be made until Congress has authorized the necessary appropriations.

In order that the Lincoln Farm and Memorial may be fittingly maintained, it is necessary that a sum in excess of the interest on the trust fund be expended annually for its maintenance and upkeep. It is, therefore, recommended that S. 5228 be amended as follows:

"Page 2, line 22, after the words 'provisions of' and before the words 'this act,' insert the language, 'section 1 of,' and in the same line, on the said page 2, after the words 'this act,' strike out the period and insert in its stead a semicolon and add the following language: 'and authorization is also hereby given for such appropriations as may in the future be deemed necessary for the proper protection, preservation, care, maintenance, and operation of the said national park or reservation, including the salaries and compensation of a superintendent and other needed employees.'"

As thus amended the bill meets the approval of the War Department.

If any additional information from the War Department is desired, I shall be pleased to furnish it.

If the Committee on Military Affairs wishes to have hearings upon the proposed legislation, the following-named officer is designated to appear before your committee: Col. William R. Gibson, Quartermaster Corps.

The proposed legislation has been submitted to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, who advises that same is not in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

DWIGHT F. DAVIS,
Secretary of War.

Mr. Speaker, to use the apt phrase, "We are confronted with a condition and not a theory." In this matter we are operating under the Budget system. If it is impossible to secure the submission through regular channels of estimates for the needed appropriations under existing law, then there is no alternative but to broaden the basic act by this proposed legislation. If this bill is enacted, we have every reason to believe that there will be submitted to Congress the necessary requests and estimates for the appropriations which must be made in order that these improvements may be made. This bill confers upon Congress specific authority to make appropriations for the detailed needs at present involved, and section 2 also authorizes all needed appropriations for the future. The bill in its entirety, as amended by the House and Senate committees and as approved by the Secretary of War, follows:

A bill (H. R. 15657) to provide for the improvement and preservation of the land and buildings of the Abraham Lincoln National Park or Reservation

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of protecting from disintegration and of improving, beautifying, and preserving the Abraham Lincoln National Park or Reservation established under the act entitled "An act to accept a deed or gift or conveyance from the Lincoln Farm Association, a corporation, to the United States of America, of land near the town of Hodgenville, county of Larue, State of Kentucky, embracing the homestead of Abraham Lincoln and the log cabin in which he was born, together with the memorial hall inclosing the same; and further to accept an assignment or transfer of an endowment fund of $50,000 in relation thereto," approved July 17, 1916 (U. S. C. title 16, secs. 211–214), the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to provide for (1) the improvement of such existing roadways, walks, and buildings in such park or reservation; and (2) the planting of such trees, plants, and shrubbery; the construction of such additional roadways, walks, and buildings, and of such fences, parking spaces, drainage structures, culverts, and bridges; and the making of such other improvements, as in his judgment may be necessary for the preservation, beautification, and protection from disintegration of such park or reservation, including the log cabin in which Abraham Lincoln was born and the memorial hall inclosing the same, and which may serve to render such park or reservation convenient for the appropriate use and enjoyment by the public.

SEC. 2. There is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the provisions of section 1 of this act; and authorization is also hereby given for such appropriations as may, in the future, be deemed necessary for the proper protection, preservation, care, maintenance, and operation of the said national park or reservation, including the salaries and compensation of a superintendent and other needed employees.

There appeared before the House committee at the hearings on this measure Col. W. R. Gibson, of the Administrative Service of the Quartermaster's Department, and he testified touching the funds needed for the indicated improvements, as carried in this bill, and from the hearings his testimony is quoted, as follows:

STATEMENT OF COL. W. R. GIBSON, OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE SERVICE IN THE QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE

Colonel GIBSON. Those are the estimates.

Mr. THATCHER. And they show that something between eighty and one hundred thousand dollars would be reasonably required to put this property in suitable condition, including roads, parking places, and things of that sort

Colonel GIBSON. Yes, sir. That report was prepared under the direction of the commanding officer, Jeffersonville Quartermaster Depot, Jeffersonville, Ind., who has administrative control of the Lincoln farm. A great many reports had been received in the office of the Quartermaster General regarding the unsatisfactory condition of this farm, and in order that proper action could be taken to remedy these conditions the Quartermaster General directed the commanding officer of the Jeffersonville Quartermaster Depot to make a detailed survey of the conditions and to submit a complete report.

Prior to the present fiscal year, the Government has spent no money on the farm, other than the interest on the trust funds which amounts to approximately $2,040 per year. This amount has proved to be entirely insufficient, with the result that the roads, grounds, buildings, and fences have deteriorated. The entire farm is in a run-down condition and can not be placed in the condition which it merits as a national shrine without the expenditure of a considerable sum of money.

The amount asked for in the report is, in my opinion, the minimum required for improvements. This would enable us to rebuild and extend the road leading from the Jackson Highway to the memorial building, provide suitable parking space, build a comfort station and rest room, repair buildings on the farm, rebuild fences and definitely mark the boundary lines, plant trees, and landscape the farm, provide suitable drainage, which is a difficult problem, and make other needed improvements. When the farm is placed in first-class condition it can be suitably maintained from small annual appropriations.

I quote the following from the favorable report of the House Committee on Military Affairs:

PURPOSES OF THE BILL

A full hearing was accorded to the proponents of the measure, at which appeared Representative THATCHER, of Kentucky, author of the bill, and Representative MOORMAN, also of Kentucky, and in whose district the indicated property is located. In addition, a representative of the United States Quartermaster Department, Col. W. R. Gibson, chief of the administrative service of that department, upon request, appeared and verified estimates of cost of required improvements and work covered by the proposed $100,000 authorization.

The purpose of this legislation is (1) to authorize the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the necessary improvement of the Lincoln farm property in Larue County, Ky., whereon Abraham Lincoln was born, and now formally known as the Abraham Lincoln National Park or Reservation, in order that the same may now be put into proper condition for its protection and preservation and rendered available for the use and enjoyment by the public, and (2) to authorize such general appropriations as may in the future be deemed necessary for the proper protection, preservation, care, maintenance, and operation of this property. The farm consists of about 110½ acres.

HISTORY OF LINCOLN FARM

As already indicated, upon this tract of land and in a little log cabin yet preserved in the memorial building thereon, then in Hardin County, and now in Larue County, Ky., Abraham Lincoln was born. It was from this farm that Thomas Lincoln, the father, removed to southern Indiana, taking with him his family, including the child who in the course of years was destined to achieve immortal distinction. After a long period, and about the year 1906, this little plot of broken land was acquired by the Lincoln Farm Association—of which Robert J. Collier, the well-known publisher, was the leading spirit—a private corporation organized for the purpose of acquiring this property and building thereon a suitable memorial to the memory of Lincoln.

In addition, the association solicited and received popular subscriptions throughout the country for the purpose of constructing such memorial, with the result that the net sum of something like $250,000 was collected. Of this total about $200,000 was expended in the construction of a beautiful memorial hall or building of marble, and the balance, about $50,000, was invested in securities to constitute a fund, the income from which should be devoted to the preservation and maintenance of the property. In this memorial hall there was then placed, there to be permanently kept and preserved, the little old log cabin in which the great emancipator was born, and there it is to-day.

ENABLING ACT

In the year 1916, during the first administration of President Wilson, there was enacted by Congress the act of July 17, 1916 (ch. 247, 30 Stat. 386; U. S. C. title 16, secs. 211–214), authorizing and confirming acceptance by the United States of America of the title to this land, together with all buildings and appurtenances thereon, and "especially the log cabin in which Abraham Lincoln was born, and the memorial hall inclosing the same," described in the deed of conveyance executed on the 11th day of April, 1916, by the Lincoln Farm Association to the United States of America. The act also, by its further terms, declared and confirmed the acceptance by the United States of the $50,000 endowment already referred to. Section 1 of the act provides that—

"The title to such lands, buildings, and appurtenances is accepted upon the terms and conditions stated in said deed or conveyance, namely: That the land therein described, together with the buildings and appurtenances thereon, shall be forever dedicated to the purposes of a national park or reservation, the United States of America agreeing to protect and preserve the said lands, buildings, and appurtenances, and especially the log cabin in which Abraham Lincoln was born and the memorial hall inclosing the same, from spoliation, destruction, and further disintegration, to the end that they may be preserved for all time, so far as may be; and further agreeing that there shall never be any charge or fee made to or asked from the public for admission to the said park or reservation."

Section 2 of the act provides that—

"The title to said endowment fund is accepted upon the terms and conditions stated in said assignment and transfer, namely, that the United States of America shall forever keep the said tract of land described in said deed, together with the buildings and appurtenances thereunto belonging, dedicated to the purpose of a national park or reservation, and that there shall never be any charge or fee made to or asked from the public for admission to the said park or reservation; and, further, shall forever protect, preserve, and maintain said land, buildings, and appurtenances, and especially the log cabin in which Abraham Lincoln was born and the memorial hall inclosing the same, from spoliation, destruction, and further disintegration, to the end that they may be preserved for all time, as far as may be, as a national park or reservation."

For obvious reasons Congress, the executive branch of the Government, and those in charge of the affairs of the Lincoln Farm Association believed that upon the construction of the memorial hall and the housing therein of the Lincoln cabin, the same, together with the original Lincoln farm, should pass into the hands of the United States Government, to be forever preserved and maintained as a great historical and patriotic shrine for the use, enjoyment, and inspirational benefit of all the people.

A GIFT TO THE GOVERNMENT

Thus this property, which had cost about $250,000, came into the hands of the United States Government without cost to it. The whole was a gift to the Government made upon the solemn compact and agreement that the United States would dedicate the property as a national park or reservation, free for public use and enjoyment, and should forever protect, preserve, and maintain the same as indicated in the language of the enabling act, already quoted.

In the printed hearings on this bill will be found the deed conveying the Lincoln farm and structures to the United States; the instrument transferring to the United States the trust or endowment fund named in the act; and the formal instrument of acceptance in behalf of the United States, executed by President Wilson and Secretary of War Newton D. Baker, for all of this property, agreeably to the terms of said act. Special reference is here made to section 3, authorizing the execution of such instrument, and to section 4, placing the property under the control and administration of the Secretary of War; and under whose control and administration the property has since remained.

NEED FOR THE PROPOSED AUTHORIZATION

It appears that the Secretary of War has expended no funds in the improvement, preservation, and maintenance of the property beyond those received as interest or income on the securities making up the trust or endowment fund already mentioned; this income is about $2,000 a year, and has proven absolutely inadequate not only for the preservation, maintenance, and protection of this property, but also for its greatly needed improvement; and Congress has made no appropriation therefor. Hence, there having been transferred to the United States of America all of this property, and having been accepted by the United States under the solemn compact or agreement, as set forth in the act of Congress, and the instrument executed in conformity therewith, forever to preserve and maintain for the use and benefit of the public as a national park or reservation the Lincoln farm and structures thereon, the United States Government will be most derelict if it fails to carry out its agreement.

Because funds for substantial protection and improvement of the property have not been provided, the grounds have fallen into a state of dangerous deterioration. Not only this but there have never been provided proper roads, parking spaces, drainage facilities, fencing, rest houses, plantings, and the like, necessary to put the property in the condition in which it should be placed and maintained.

At present, as fully set forth in the hearings, the grounds around the memorial building and the old Lincoln spring are periodically flooded by rains and become veritable swamps; there is no adequate roadway approach to the memorial from the Jackson Highway, a greatly traveled north and south public thoroughfare, and Federal-aid project, which runs through the Lincoln farm.

There should be a better approach to the memorial constructed, and also adequate parking spaces. In addition, means for proper draining of the property should be provided; and the fencing and planting of trees and shrubs in certain sections of the farm, to protect and beautify it, should be made. At present, portions of the farm are being washed into deep gullies, and these contribute not only to the unkempt and unsightly appearance of the grounds, but also add to the general deterioration of the property. Last year, under direction of the Quartermaster's Department, a careful survey was made of the conditions on the Lincoln farm, and a formal report was submitted to the Quartermaster General showing the pressing needs in the matter of improvement and preservation of this property. The detailed estimate submitted with that report shows that it will cost not less than $80,101.97 to put the property in proper condition. This detailed estimate appears in the printed hearings on the bill. Some of the major items of the estimate follow:

For fencing, $2,000; for reconstruction of present approach road, $11,410.30; for continuation of present approach road around the rear of memorial building to old log house on the farm, $28,000; for filling in gullies and erosions, $1,050; for installation of tile, etc., for drainage purposes, $950; for construction of 14,000 square feet of parking area near the memorial, $15,609.27; for replacement of present gravel on landings in steps to memorial building and walks around building with brick, $1,797.40; for construction of rest rooms, septic tank, sewage disposal, and connection to water supply, $12,000; for installation of new pumping unit, cleaning out the old well, and renovating old water tank, $800; for additional labor needed for care of property, $1,860. Other items of a minor nature make up the difference involved in the total above referred to. Also in the hearings will be found other extracts from the report of the Quartermaster's Department, referred to, touching the urgent needs involved, and much other valuable information, including a brief history of the Lincoln cabin now preserved in the memorial.

The amount received in annual income on the investment fund pays something in the way of compensation to the caretaker and some part-time help, but, of course, does not afford any margin for substantial improvements on the property.

Recently the Secretary of War submitted to the Bureau of the Budget a recommendation for an appropriation for the above-named sum, $80,101.97, for the indicated purposes; but the Budget officers have indicated their judgment that in order to provide an appropriation for these improvements it will be necessary for a bill authorizing such appropriation to be enacted. Hence, the present measure was introduced to provide this authorization, and also to authorize in the future such further appropriations as may be deemed necessary for the proper care, preservation, maintenance, and operation of this property. A committee amendment to section 2 was adopted after conference by Representative THATCHER with Budget and War Department officials. This amendment, if adopted, will authorize such future appropriations as may be required for the purpose just indicated. Any such appropriations will be in addition to the annual income which will be received from the investment fund, and that income will, of course, reduce by its amount the total of such appropriations, which in the future may be thus required.

Since the estimates of the Quartermaster's Department indicate that something more than $80,000 is needed for the purpose of placing the property in condition to be properly preserved and to be properly used and enjoyed by the general public—as was contemplated by Congress and the executive branch of the Government when the property was taken over by the Government—the pending bill carries an authorization for present improvement purposes of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary. If the bill becomes a law, estimates and justification for the needed improvements will have to be submitted through regular channels and appropriations made by Congress upon the usual hearings obtaining in such matters. All these proposed improvements will be on the Lincoln farm or reservation, and none outside of it.

Under the intolerable conditions which obtain at present the general public can not have proper access to this historic spot, nor the simplest conveniences when visiting it. Because of the lack of proper roadways and parking spaces, visitors at certain seasons must trudge through mud and slush in order to visit the memorial and to see therein the Lincoln cabin; and also when visiting the memorial in any numbers they are unable to find parking space for their cars and are subjected to every form of inconvenience.

The committee deems it unnecessary to argue further the merits of the proposed measure. The obligation of the United States Government is of the most sacred character and should be discharged. This property is going to rack and ruin because there have not been made the necessary improvements for its care and preservation, and because of the impossible physical conditions obtaining the people are being denied the right to visit this great shrine and to receive the inspirational value of such contact.

Under the circumstances involved any continued failure to make the necessary improvements and to render this historic site fully available for the use and enjoyment of our people would, in the committee's judgment, be considered as nothing less than a national disgrace. Definite and adequate action should be at once taken.

The indicated improvements should be made, and made without further delay, and the property put in suitable condition, and thus maintained, so that the purposes and intent of Congress in the act of acceptance, and the purposes and intent of the donors of the property and of the executive branch of the Government may be carried out.

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, if the appropriations could be secured without the necessity of further legislation, such result would have been greatly preferred, for the time and effort necessary to secure this enactment would have been avoided. The proponents of this bill, however, knowing the needs involved—as the officials of the War Department also know them—and finding it impossible to secure the submission to Congress, under existing law, of the required estimates, and after conferences with the various executive officers who must deal with the subject, have proposed this bill and have asked its enactment, feeling assured that if and when it shall become a law all these officials will agree that their right to ask for the needed funds will be of the most undoubted character, and will act accordingly.

In the absence of such enactment we can hardly hope to secure the necessary appropriations. Since between eighty and one hundred thousand dollars will be required to put this property in condition for preservation and public use, it is not to be hoped that in the absence of a Budget recommendation therefor an appropriation may be secured. Even if included in an appropriation bill, a point of order might be made against the item. Why not make the authority clear? For these reasons this bill should be enacted—and enacted without delay—so that there may come through the Bureau of the Budget the estimates for the required appropriations and the items included in the last deficiency bill of this session.

Mr. Speaker, this spot, this shrine, is of too sacred a character, and the obligation of the United States is of too solemn a nature, to permit of any further delay on the subject of the proper improvement and preservation of this property. Let us enact this bill into law, and the questions at issue will be forever settled and this holy place will be, for all time, rendered available for the use, enjoyment, and inspirational benefit of the people.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MOORMAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. MOORMAN. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, I have the honor to represent the fourth district of Kentucky, from which Abraham Lincoln came. [Applause.] I have an intimate knowledge of the situation that prevails at his birthplace. In my humble opinion, it is a disgrace to the name of the proud Nation that accepted the gift of $300,000 of the money of the people of my State and the Nation. That $300,000 was largely contributed 10 cents and a quarter of a dollar at a time by the school children and citizens, and the Lincoln Memorial Association came here and made a sacred contract with the United States by which the Government took over this property 13 years ago; and to-day the same conditions prevail there that prevailed then. I respectfully refer you to my speech delivered on January 17 for the details. The sacred contract made April 12, 1916, is to-day unfulfilled. It provided:

The title to such lands, buildings, and appurtenances is accepted upon the terms and conditions stated in said deed or conveyance, namely, that the land therein described, together with the buildings and appurtenances thereon, shall be forever dedicated to the purpose of national park or reservation, the United States of America agreeing to protect and preserve the said lands, buildings, and appurtenances, and especially the log cabin in which Abraham Lincoln was born and the memorial hall inclosing the same, from spoliation, destruction, and further disintegration, to the end that they may be preserved for all time, so far as may be; and further agreeing that there shall never be any charge or fee made to or asked from the public for admission to the said park or reservation.

And, as to the endowment fund, said bill provided:

The title to said endowment fund is accepted upon the terms and conditions stated in said assignment and transfer, namely, that the United States of America shall forever keep the said tract of land described in said deed, together with the buildings and appurtenances thereunto belonging, dedicated to the purpose of a national park or reservation, and that there shall never be any charge or fee made to or asked from the public for admission to the said park or reservation; and, further, shall forever protect, preserve, and maintain said land, buildings, and appurtenances, and especially the log cabin in which Abraham Lincoln was born and the memorial hall inclosing the same, from spoliation, destruction, and further disintegration, to the end that they may be preserved for all time, as far as may be, as a national park or reservation.

It was contemplated by the act in the minds of the contracting parties, that there would be all necessary repairs and future development. Section 3 specifically provides:

That the President of the United States of America and the Secretary of War are hereby authorized to execute, in the name of the United States of America, such instrument or instruments as may be or may become necessary to comply with or carry out the terms and conditions of such gift or gifts and to secure the full benefit therefrom.

I said:

The Lincoln Farm Association had collected together the essentials to create this national shrine. Congress accepted it and agreed to do such things as necessary "to secure full benefit therefrom." Otherwise the association would have continued to function by collecting more money by popular subscription, thereby maintaining and improving the place to meet present conditions.

At this time it is impossible for the thousands of people from America and other countries to come there and view that sacred spot with comfort or real pleasure. Recently 17 automobiles, carrying 40 people each, came there at one time. The road is only 10 or 12 feet wide, and those conveyances undertook to go down to that shrine, but they could not all get there. There was great confusion and discomfort, and there were comments which made us ashamed of ourselves. Deterioration, waste, and regret command one's attention. It is not the fault of Kentucky, and it is not the fault of those patriotic, liberty-loving people who made the gift to the Government. They turned over that sacred cabin, inclosed in a $225,000 marble memorial building, 110 acres of land and appurtenances, and an endowment fund of $50,000, making in all $300,000, under the sacred promise that this shrine would be maintained in proper order and so as to get the maximum use of it from that day until now. What is the result? Thirteen years have elapsed and nothing has been done. Conditions have been and are growing worse each day. A mere pittance of $5,000 was appropriated, and only about $2,500 of that amount has ever been used. The War Department knew the sum was inadequate, as their report shows.

We made application to the Bureau of the Budget and to the War Department, under whose jurisdiction this comes, and they advised us to introduce a bill. We have now introduced a bill, and we are told that it is a mistake. I did not think it was necessary under the law, but the failure to act made it so.

I come here as one of that species that is now about to become extinct down in Kentucky, a Democratic Representative, and I respectfully implore you, regardless of your politics and regardless of the side of the House on which you sit, to give this bill your support and help honor the name and memory of a man my district loves. [Applause.] This is no time nor place for eloquence, but our country must save its honor and keep its word.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORMAN. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. The situation the gentleman has disclosed is disgraceful, of course, and should be corrected, but there is one question which occurs to me.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one-half minute additional.

Mr. BURTNESS. I notice that the bill provides not only for the building of fences, the improvement of roads, the construction of sanitary conveniences, providing parking spaces, and so forth, but also provides for beautifying the place by the planting of trees and shrubbery and making a park out of it. Now, it occurs to me that the general public would be more inspired by seeing the physical farm as it exists there, but properly protected. It seems to me they would rather see it substantially as it was at the time of the birth of Lincoln than to have it changed into a park.

Mr. MOORMAN. There will be a real old rail fence to protect this place. We are going to preserve the Lincoln farm and the buildings and appurtenances in such manner as to meet the ideas advanced by my interested colleague.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I have no idea that I will be able to secure the defeat of this bill, so great is the regard of every Member for the memory of Lincoln, but, as a matter of fact, that is not involved in this bill at all.

I have been much surprised to have recognition given for the consideration of this bill under suspension of the rules. There are so many bills of importance on the calendar that I had not supposed it would be easy to get recognition to bring up this bill, a bill which is absolutely unnecessary. It had not been reached on the Unanimous Consent Calendar until to-day. To-day was the first time it was called. When it was called I pointed out the law which authorizes these appropriations, just as much as the bill now pending authorizes them. In other words, the passage of this bill will add nothing in authority for appropriations for this very desirable purpose.

Mr. MOORMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. MOORMAN. If the gentleman believes we already have that authority, how can it hurt to pass this bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Why do we not spend our time here in passing a multitude of entirely useless bills when there are so many important measures awaiting consideration?

Any parliamentarian in the House will agree with me, I know, that the language I am about to read from the fundamental act authorizes appropriations for this purpose, and all the pending bill does is to authorize appropriations.

I will read from the fundamental act:

> The United States accepts title to the lands mentioned in the deed of gift or conveyance now in the possession of the Secretary of War, together with all of the buildings and appurtenances thereon, especially the log cabin in which Abraham Lincoln was born and the memorial hall inclosing the same; * * * that the land therein described in such deed or conveyance * * * shall be forever dedicated to the purposes of a national park or reservation, the United States of America agreeing to protect and preserve the said lands, buildings, and appurtenances, and especially the log cabin in which Abraham Lincoln was born and the memorial hall inclosing the same from spoliation and destruction and further disintegration to the end that they may be preserved for all time. * * * And further shall forever protect, preserve, and maintain said lands, buildings, and appurtenances, and especially the log cabin, * * * to the end that they may be preserved for all time as far as may be as a national park or reservation.

Now, under our rules there are numerous precedents. It is not disputed by any parliamentarian that when we pass an act imposing a duty on a branch of the Government that act itself is basis for appropriations to carry out such responsibility. This act places on the Secretary of War this responsibility. It authorizes appropriations. The bill that is now being presented does not add anything whatever to that authority.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. As I understand, a favorable recommendation could not be secured from the War Department, and the O. K. of the Budget could not be secured. Let us assume we would offer an amendment on the floor to the appropriation bill; I think I can hear the gentleman from Michigan saying that it did not have the O. K. of the Budget.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman has no right to assume that, but I will say——

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I have heard the gentleman so many times say that.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say this to the gentleman from Kentucky that if such an amendment was offered on the floor to the appropriation bill he would not hear the gentleman from Michigan make the point of order that it was not authorized by existing law, because I know it is authorized, and if the gentleman from Kentucky wants to bring that question up, why did not the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THATCHER] or the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MOORMAN], if they knew of these conditions—I did not know of them—offer an amendment to the War Department appropriation bill, and this House would have voted it, and the gentlemen would have had their money in the pending War Department appropriation bill.

Mr. THATCHER. Will the gentleman let me answer for myself, inasmuch as he called me by name? Because I know that of all men the gentleman would have been the first to interpose a technical objection. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Well, now, Mr. Speaker, I will say this to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THATCHER], that there is no one in this House who spends more time getting money out of the Treasury and less time in keeping it there than the gentleman from Kentucky. [Applause.] So I necessarily give the gentleman special attention, but I know the rules of the House, and if I had been interested in this proposition, I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky, as the gentleman professes to be, I would not have tried to get the limelight with a bill here with my name on it, but I would have offered an amendment to the War Department appropriation bill and would have had the money. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill passed?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER) there were—ayes 230, noes 21.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

AMENDMENT OF FOREIGN SERVICE BUILDINGS ACT

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass as amended the bill (H. R. 15735) to amend the Foreign Service buildings act, 1926, as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 15735 as amended. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Foreign Service buildings act, 1926, as amended (U. S. C. Supp. I, title 22, secs. 292–299; 45 Stat. L. p. 971), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"SEC. 9. At the request of the Foreign Service Buildings Commission, the President is authorized to detail such officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Army and the Navy, as in his judgment may be necessary, to the Department of State for duty in connection with the exercise of functions under the provisions of this act, the number so detailed not to exceed 10 on any one project.

"SEC. 10. During the period of such detail any such officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man shall receive the pay and allowances of his respective rank or rating, and the period of such detail shall be counted in computing longevity and retirement, in the same manner and to the same extent as if such officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man was serving with the military or naval forces.

"SEC. 11. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man detailed for duty under this act shall be entitled to receive rental allowances while serving outside the continental limits of the United States, whether or not public quarters are available and occupied by any such officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill gives to the Secretary of State, under the direction of the Foreign Service Buildings Commission, authority to secure the services of officers of the Army and the Navy to superintend the construction of embassies, legations, and consulates in various parts of the world.

The Foreign Service Buildings Commission consists of the Secretaries of State, Treasury, and Commerce, the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House.

We are ready to begin construction in a number of places throughout the world and the problem of proper supervision of the work, which is vital to securing a proper return for the money of the Government, is a matter of very great importance. It is customary to superintend work of this kind everywhere. The duty is usually performed by the architect. But in many of these places, some of them quite inaccessible, it would be impossible to have this work properly done unless we are certain that it will be superintended by men from the Government service.

The commission, therefore, reached the conclusion that the safe thing to do was to secure this authorization to detail Army engineers, or in some instances engineers of the Navy, as superintendents. It is especially necessary because the work is largely reinforced concrete, and it is absolutely necessary to put the proper ingredients into the mixture.

Take, for instance, Calcutta, the plans are about ready for an office building and apartment. It is an emergency case, as many are. For instance, last year the turnover in the commercial service was over 100 per cent on account of ill health. The buildings will be concrete.

There is another provision in the bill which follows the policy of Congress in regard to the river and harbor improvements in cases where it will be impossible to secure competent contractors. Take for instance Tegucigalpa, Honduras. I have in mind another city where there is only one contractor. The commission desires to be in position whereby, if necessary, it can do the work where we can not get satisfactory contracts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What status do these military officers assigned to these places have? Are they attachés?

Mr. PORTER. They have no status.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman think we can send a sailor or a soldier into a country unless he is a military attaché?

Mr. PORTER. They hold a position in the Government. We shall send only one man, except to the important places, where we may send four or five men. We may have to send additional men where we do the work ourselves. We will need two or three warrant officers as bookkeepers or clerks in these instances.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Why can not you take employees from the Treasury Department accustomed to building and this kind of work, and then we will not have any complications?

Mr. PORTER. There is no danger of any complications. We are doing it now; we are doing it in Haiti.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Why should warrant officers obtain rental allowances if there are public quarters available?

Mr. PORTER. That is following the general law. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, this bill is not as innocent as it looks. It is a departure from custom and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has presented no reason why it is necessary to detail officers and soldiers of the Army and the Navy and the Marine Corps to foreign countries to assist and participate in superintending the building of embassy structures. Now, gentlemen, if you read the report there is not one single word from the Secretary of State, and I doubt very much whether this bill has the indorsement of the Department of State. Under the present practice and custom of generations of use, military and naval officers may be assigned to foreign countries only as duly accredited attachés of the legation or embassy.

Mr. PORTER. Will the gentleman yield? It has the indorsement of the Foreign Service Buildings Commission, consisting of three Cabinet officers and four Members of Congress.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the Department of State as such interested in the proposed sending of these sailors and soldiers into foreign countries to look out for the contracts and buildings?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Does the gentleman know whether the War Department or the Navy Department, who will have supervision over these men, have been consulted and have been given an opportunity to make any comment upon this bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course the big question here relates to our relations with foreign countries in sending members of the armed forces there who have no diplomatic connection.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. My question is whether the armed forces of the United States can be used in any capacity without the particular departments having them in charge consenting to it.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In a moment. If the Members of the House will read the bill, they will find that it even provides for sending a medical officer along with each detachment, and it looks like a regular military mission. Picture the complications that would arise if any of these soldiers who are sent to supervise the mixing of the concrete, as described by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER], should get into a fight with native laborers. We would immediately have a complicated international situation, because it would be immediately charged that natives of a foreign country assaulted officers of the American Army or Navy. If the only purpose of the bill were to obtain supervision over contractors, or to get the necessary experienced talent where we are putting up buildings by ourselves, this commission might call on the Treasury Department, which has a trained building force that is now constructing a hundred million dollars' worth of buildings, and not take inexperienced men from the Army and Navy.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The only purpose of that is that the Army and the Navy men may be on the ground, and why not utilize them for that purpose, instead of going to the expense of sending men from Washington to do a very small job of supervising?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Very well. Then I say to the gentleman from Iowa that if there were a bill before the House providing that where officers, warrant officers, or enlisted men of the Army and the Navy are on foreign service at a place where the Foreign Service Commission is constructing a building, that such officers and men may be detailed to that work, there would be no serious objection to it. But this bill is such a departure from precedent, something so novel, so unnecessary, as to make the bill silly. The very idea is silly. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what is meant by this language:

> The President is authorized to detail such officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Army and the Navy, as in his judgment may be necessary, to the Department of State for duty in connection with the exercise of functions under the provisions of this act.

Mr. PORTER. It means just exactly what it says, the exercise of functions under the provisions of this act. The officers detailed superintend the construction of the work, and it is a very important matter. I can not emphasize this too much.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Why is it important to have soldiers and sailors do that.

Mr. PORTER. Instances are bound to arise where the Government will have to do the work itself, which will require yeomen or two or three soldiers as timekeepers and bookkeepers to perform duties of that sort.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The confusion has been rather considerable during this argument and I have not been able to get all that has been said. Do I understand now that this is to authorize the detailing from the Army of officers or men in uniform to render certain services in connection with the construction of embassy buildings or buildings where our ministers are to be housed, provided for under the laws that we have passed within the past few years?

Mr. PORTER. Yes; although I doubt very much that they would wear uniforms. I see no necessity for it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But the bill authorizes them to do that; does it?

Mr. PORTER. Yes; they could if they wanted to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania think that that might be extremely dangerous? We certainly do not expect or desire to try to construct buildings for our ministers or our ambassadors in any country in which we have to use soldiers to do it.

Mr. PORTER. No; it is not intended in that sense at all. We must exercise a proper oversight over construction, and this is the best way to do it. As a matter of fact there would be very few cases where there will be over two or three of our men on the ground; in many cases only one. We naturally look to the Army and the Navy Departments, because they have trained men. I will say to the gentleman from New York, the Navy Department was represented before the committee and supported this measure. It is the only way that we have of assuring a proper return for the taxpayers' money.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It still seems to me to be a very peculiar thing that we should utilize men in uniform, I do not care how capable they are, who will have anything to do with the construction of buildings for the occupancy of ministers and ambassadors in other countries.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will yield.

Mr. DENISON. As I understand, although I may be misinformed, we have a great many men in the Engineer Corps, both Army and Navy, who have experience in this kind of work. It does not necessarily follow that they be in uniform; we have that class of men selected for construction work on our rivers and harbors and other construction work, flood-control work, and so forth, and if we want to have intelligent men supervise or look over the building of these buildings in foreign countries it seems to me we might well use this class of men for that purpose rather than to go to the expense of employing high-priced engineers from private life. I can not see any objection, merely because when they are on duty in the Army and Navy they have to wear uniforms, I do not see any objection to detailing them to look after such construction work.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman state the status these men have in foreign countries. River and harbor work is all on American soil under the jurisdiction of the United States Government.

Mr. DENISON. When we build an embassy or legation building in a foreign country we are carrying on the business of our Government with the permission of that government, and we have a right to send anybody we want to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I beg to differ with the gentleman. Does the gentleman intend to say that when a foreign government builds an embassy in Washington, D. C., it can send over here anybody it wants to in violation of the immigration law, in violation of the treaties, in violation of the labor laws, in violation of the health laws? Of course, it can not, and such a proposition is silly.

Mr. DENISON. I do not mean to say that, and I did not say it, and the gentleman can not properly draw any such inference from what I said. We do not intend to do anything contrary to the laws of other countries.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have no greater right in a foreign territory than a foreign government has in our territory.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman knows this bill does not contemplate our Government violating the laws of any country. Our Government would not do such a thing. We could not authorize it if we wanted to do so. This merely authorizes the detail of some men of the Army or the Navy or the Marine Corps to look after the building of our buildings in foreign countries.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, has not provided in his bill the status of these men in foreign countries under the treaties.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield, of course, we have an Engineering Corps engaged in river and harbor improvements and works of that kind of an engineering character. Can the gentleman from New York or the gentleman from Pennsylvania state any use that is made of Army or Navy officers in construction work—I am speaking of construction work upon buildings—other than for the use of the Army or the Navy itself? We did not use them in the hospitals or the Veterans' Bureau——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. San Francisco fire.

Mr. PORTER. They supervised the buildings in Haiti——

Mr. CRAMTON. That is for the Army.

Mr. PORTER. If you will go to Port au Prince you will find four buildings put up there by the marines.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is aside from my statement. I am asking whether we use Army and Navy officers in Government construction work in this country other than in the Army itself or in the Navy itself? We do not put them at work on our post-office buildings, do we?

Mr. DYER. They put them on river and harbor work—engineers.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am speaking of buildings.

Mr. DYER. All the public buildings are put up under the Treasury except those for the Army and the Navy.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. My understanding is that the Army and Navy at the present time—in the Navy in the Bureau of Yards and Docks and in the Army in the civil engineer section—they have not enough men to take care of more work than they are doing themselves. It seems inexpedient that we should send those men over the water to do this work. We ought to hire civilian help.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. The British are building an embassy in Washington. What would Congress think if the British Government were to send 10 or 15 soldiers from their army to put up that building?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They would not get very far. This bill takes men inexperienced in construction work, and take a hard-boiled quartermaster sergeant who gets into a row with his laborers; instead of a labor problem you are going to have an international problem on your hands.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It seems to me if we have more people in the Army and Navy than can be used for the purposes that the Army and Navy are created for, we ought to dismiss the surplus, and if we have no more than we need we ought to keep as many as we need. It certainly does seem to me that we are treading on rather dangerous ground when we propose to take a part of the military force away from the service they enlisted for and put them into the matter of building in foreign countries.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I think that is a very good place to stop, so I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] misinterpret the intention of this committee. Congress appropriated a sum of $10,000,000 a few years ago, to be expended in the building of United States embassies and office buildings throughout the world. There are a number of these projects to go up. Some of them are under contract and in some out-of-the-way places it may be necessary to build them by day labor.

Now, the Foreign Service Building Commission feels a very deep responsibility in connection with the expenditure of this $10,000,000 and it wishes to throw around it every safeguard possible; to see that none of the money is lost or wasted and that no more money is paid than is necessary for those projects. We want to see the Government get a full dollar's worth of work for every dollar. We want to see that contractors live up to their contracts and put up buildings in accordance with the plans and specifications. The intention of this bill is merely this: If your Foreign Service Commission feels that a man is necessary for such a project, to get the President to detail him to do that. When you gentlemen voted for $24,000,000 to be spent as the President thought proper in prohibition enforcement, I think you can feel perfectly safe that the President is not going to detail any man to any country unless that detail is perfectly satisfactory to that country.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I regret I can not. I will ask that you get more time if you desire it.

It is necessary to see that this work is done properly. Sometimes the man is called "the clerk of the work." If the work is done by day labor without a contract, it is necessary to put a capable man there to see that the work is done in proper proportion. In another case it may be necessary to have a private soldier detailed on that work, or a man from the quartermaster's department who is thoroughly acquainted with building, to see that the contract is properly carried out.

What we are trying to do is to place every safeguard possible around the expenditure of your money. You gave it to us to spend. We want to perform our duty faithfully, and we want to avail ourselves of our people in this country in whom we have confidence who can help us. We feel a deep responsibility in this expenditure of $10,000,000. Now I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In a place where we have an ambassador and counsel to the embassy and first, second, and third chargés d'affaires and a disbursing officer, is it necessary to send a quartermaster to see that the work is properly done?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not think the counsel has the time to devote to it. I know very well that the ambassador has not the time to spare. In fact, I know that no man in these embassies has time to devote to this work.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. What kind of a crossroads place is it that is so small that the Government, when it is going to build a building there, can not get a contractor to build it?

Mr. LINTHICUM. In Central America and in China there are several places where you can not get a man with whom to make a contract.

Mr. STEVENSON. Are those the proper places in which to spend this money?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Some of these countries are very unhealthy and it is necessary to place men under proper sanitary conditions to carry on these buildings.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I would like to ask whether the gentleman knows of any instance where the Treasury Department has called for the detail of Army or Navy personnel to supervise the construction of buildings in this country or whether they do not hire supervisors when they need supervisors.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Of course, in this country you can get all the people you want, your own people, but what we want in these foreign countries is some of our own people to see that the work is properly done.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. KORELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. KORELL. The question was asked a minute ago whether the officer personnel of the Army or Navy had ever been called upon to render service of this character in the past. I would like to ask if the gentleman recalls that when the Government buildings were under construction in Porto Rico, the local contractor fell down on the work and the Navy thereupon sent officers from the department to complete the work and that they completed it at much less cost than the contractor had originally figured?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I recollect that very well. I also recollect the case when they were building the President's palace in Haiti. There the contractor fell down and our Navy men went down there and completed that contract according to the plans and specifications, and the contractor got $100,000 for that because the Navy men did so well and efficiently.

Mr. KORELL. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. KORELL. The gentleman knows, I presume, that the War Department is now using its officer personnel to survey the potential water power of the country for irrigation purposes and for river and harbor work; also for flood-control work?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Certainly, and they are doing splendid work, too.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Let me direct the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the bill does not limit the use of these men to supervision of construction. It permits their detail for any purpose in connection with the exercise of the functions of the building act; that is to say, if a member of the commission were to go to South America on an inspection trip, this bill authorizes the appointment of a general and a couple of majors as his aides on that inspection trip. The bill is not limited to construction work.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman has too much regard and too much respect for the President of the United States to believe he would detail a force of that kind to accompany anyone making an inspection trip in South America or to any other country. I want you to understand, in the first place, that you have the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of Commerce; then, besides that, you have four Members of Congress composing this commission. This commission must first ask the President to detail a man; then the President considers it, and if he thinks well of it he does it. If not, he does not do it. I think the situation has every safeguard thrown around it.

Gentlemen, in conclusion, I want to say that the matter is entirely with you. We are trying to carry out your orders in the best way possible. We are trying to get you a dollar for a dollar and the best buildings that can be constructed. We are trying to safeguard the spending of the taxpayers' money. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to oppose a bill that is brought in by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, because I know it is a hard-working committee and that it tries to do what is right, but it seems to me it is absolutely incongruous and ridiculous for us to send officers of the Army and Navy all over the world to build buildings. In the first place, you have a lot of problems to consider when you come to erect buildings in a strange place. You have a strange country and climate, and you need an architect who knows the climatic conditions and the conditions under which a building should be built in that place. In the next place, you need a man who understands the language of the people where the building is being built.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Surely.

Mr. BEGG. On the question of having an architect who knows local conditions, let me say to the gentleman that the architect who built the Imperial Hotel at Tokyo was a Chicago man and during the earthquake it never had a crack in it, and it was the only building that weathered the storm.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But he was not a quartermaster sergeant.

Mr. BEGG. No; and he was not a Jap.

Mr. TABER. He had to have a local architect to tell him about climatic conditions and direct him as to matters of that kind. Now, we must hire local architects, and it seems to me that we should do in this instance the ordinary and usual thing and hire civilian architects to do this work.

If our Army and our Navy are going to be called on to do all the civilian work of this Government, and if we are to be obliged to create an organization there which duplicates the organizations in other places, our Army and our Navy are not going to do the things which they are ordinarily supposed to do, and they are not going to function along the lines that we expect when we appropriate money for the Army and the Navy. [Applause.]

These people have not any more architectural help than they need in their own departments. When they go to build a great, big Army post with barracks in a large center of the country, they call in local architects to do this sort of work and to advise them on it. There is not any sense in our sending them to do the things which they are called upon to ask for help on themselves, and it seems to me we should reject this bill and maintain the dignity and the position of our Army and our Navy. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PORTER) there were—ayes 82, noes 56.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So (two-thirds having failed to vote in favor thereof) the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was rejected.

AMENDMENT OF WAR MINERALS ACT

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass, as amended, the bill (S. 1347) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1919, as amended.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any claimant who has heretofore filed with the Secretary of the Interior within the time and manner provided by existing law a claim under said acts generally known as the war minerals acts (40 Stats. 1272, and its amendments) may within one year from the date of the passage and approval hereof petition the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to review the final decision of the Secretary of the Interior upon any question of law which has arisen or which may hereafter arise in the adjustment, liquidation, and payment of his claim under said acts, but the decision of the Secretary of the Interior on all questions of fact shall be conclusive and not subject to review by any court.

SEC. 2. In any proceeding brought under the provisions of section 1 of this act the Secretary of the Interior shall be designated as the defendant or respondent, and upon the filing of the petition the cause shall follow the usual procedure, subject to such rules or orders as the court may make with respect thereto.

SEC. 3. Jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, as a district court of the United States, to hear and determine all such suits and enter all orders, judgments, and decrees therein, subject to the usual right of appeal by either party to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, whose final judgment may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States by petition for certiorari or by appeal as provided by law and the rules of the court.

SEC. 4. Upon the final disposition of such proceeding, the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall without delay certify to the Secretary of the Interior the final judgment or decree rendered therein, whereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall proceed with the final adjustment of said claim in accordance with the law as construed by the court in such judgment or decree.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, we have taken up Senate bill (S. 1347), and we are striking out all except the enacting clause and substituting as an amendment House bill H. R. 15861.

There have been quite a number of bills introduced on this subject during the last eight or nine years. It has finally boiled itself down to this proposition.

In 1919 Congress passed what is known as the war minerals act. It set aside $8,500,000 to take care of losses in the production of certain minerals during the war. This act gave the Secretary of the Interior entire jurisdiction in hearing and determining both questions of law and questions of fact. Some 1,200 claims have been filed and these have been adjudicated. There remains unexpended nearly $1,000,000.

There has been much complaint on the part of the various claimants to the effect that the Secretary of the Interior has not properly construed the law. There has been very little objection on the questions of fact.

All this bill does is simply to give the claimants the right to go to the district court, the court of appeals, and the Supreme Court on the questions of law alone. The action of the Secretary of the Interior under this bill, on questions of fact, is still final and conclusive.

So it is up to the House to say whether or not we want to give these claimants the right to go to the courts to have a construction of the law. If the courts construe the law as the Secretary of the Interior construed it, there will be no expenditure; but on the other hand, if the contention as to the law in two important particulars is overturned, it may cost the Government as much as $3,000,000, according to the report of the Secretary of the Interior. We already have something like a million dollars.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman explain why he changed the Senate bill in that the Senate bill provides for an appeal of the cases to the Court of Claims, and in his bill it goes to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Does the gentleman know that the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia is very much overworked? We have had to give them an extra judge, and they are asking for more judges.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The Senate bill would give everybody the right to go to the Court of Claims, and there they would retry the case, go into questions of fact and law. Now, after 10 years we felt that the Government would be at a tremendous disadvantage in meeting the questions of fact. So the committee thought it wise if we limited it to one question and one question only.

Mr. DYER. Why not leave it to the Court of Claims? There are able lawyers upon that bench.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The Senate bill does not limit it to that.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. I wonder if the committee gave thought to this fact: We provided for the method of procedure to settle it by the Secretary of the Interior, while another set of claims were to be settled under the Dent Act by the Secretary of War.

Now, if you are going to open the cases where they did not think they had got sufficient money, would it prevent these men who did not get as much as they thought they ought to get under the Dent Act opening up their claim?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Under the Dent Act all claimants except these have the right to go into the courts. Under this act as to war minerals the decision as to the facts and as to the law rests entirely in the bosom of the Secretary of the Interior. Representatives of the Interior Department came before our committee and said they did not object, but would welcome the construction of the law by the courts of the country as to this law and any other administered by that department.

I do not think there is anything unfair in allowing two or three litigants to go into court and have the courts construe the law. If the Secretary of the Interior has not properly construed the will of Congress, then the claimants have the right to have it properly construed. If the Secretary of the Interior has properly construed the law, undoubtedly the courts will say so.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, this is the third time the general proposition has come before Congress. The first time we passed the law supposedly to cover all of the claimants. The second time that it came up, again we included some more.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes; we enlarged it. There have been a number of bills before the committee to enlarge the scope of the act. I have resisted them all, but I do not find it in my heart to deny citizens of this country the right to have the law construed.

Mr. SNELL. This does not enlarge the number of claimants?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. No; there are no new claims. No new claims can be filed under this bill.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WINGO. As a matter of fact, all this bill does is to authorize the court to determine a disputed question of law that has arisen in the department, and about which the department itself is in doubt as to what the law is. I do not think the bill goes far enough.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. This does not enlarge the act. It does not permit any new claims to be filed. It is merely an authorization for the courts to construe the act, and the Secretary of the Interior will administer it in accordance with the construction by the courts.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is my recollection that we made a special class when the minerals claim acts were put on a legal basis, and not merely on a moral basis. We made one limit of cost; then a second limit of cost was created.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. No; it was not, only in the way of interpretation, admitting claims that had been denied.

Mr. CRAMTON. There has been a controversy each time and we were told that that was all there was to it.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. It came up last time on proposition for Congress to declare the intention of the law on interest and invested capital.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am speaking of the one before that, when assurance was given that that would be the end of it.

Mr. WINGO. But that did not pass.

Mr. CRAMTON. I refer to the one we did pass before that.

Mr. WINGO. The fund and the limit have been cut down as a matter of fact. It never has been increased. This does not increase it.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The first fund in 1918 was for $50,000,000. In March, 1919, the Congress itself cut it down to $8,500,000. As the Secretary of the Interior has construed the law and has administered the law, there is still a balance of the appropriation of nearly $1,000,000.

Mr. SNELL. I definitely understood the second time we passed an act that we opened it up and took in more claims that had never been considered before.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. That is true. That was in 1921.

Mr. CRAMTON. My recollection of it is not any too clear. It is brought up here very suddenly and I have not a chance to examine my files. My recollection of that last bill which was passed made possible the consideration of a number of claims of extremely dubious character, very shadowy rights involving men who had prospected in time of war with hopes of great reward and that they are now to come in and get their claims allowed.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. That has no bearing on this bill.

Mr. WINGO. This has no bearing on that.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am sorry that it comes up now when we do not have an opportunity to check up with our files and see what it does.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of the Interior has ruled that this act does not provide for the repayment of money expended for the purchase of property to produce these minerals. It does not provide for the payment of interest where men borrowed money to go into these mining ventures. The only question now that this bill will open up when the law is construed is: Does the law authorize repayment for the purchase of property or the payment of interest that was borrowed to go into these mining operations?

Mr. DYER. Suppose the law does state that, suppose the Supreme Court decided that way, then, of course, if the claims are opened up and allowed, some of these dubious or large claims referred to will, if allowed, necessitate the appropriation of more money than has been appropriated by the Congress.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. According to the report of the Secretary of the Interior, if these two items are allowed under the law, it will not mean more than $3,000,000, and there is to-day about $1,000,000 of the unexpended appropriation that would be applied. The Secretary says it might cost not more than a million and a half.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Is it not a fact that the decision of the Secretary of the Interior is based largely upon the assumption that these ventures were largely speculative, and that he did not believe that the Government should attempt to repay these men for money expended or chanced during the war, for the sake of profits?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. That is not his view. He just held that the law does not permit the refund of money paid to buy mineral lands out of which was to be mined these minerals, and that he is not authorized to pay interest on money borrowed to go into this business.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The law may possibly permit the Government to pay interest, but it has been the practice of Congress ever since I have been here to refuse to pay interest.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The question is: Was that interest for borrowed capital to go in as an element of loss? If the court holds it is an element of loss, then it comes within the law.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The court always holds that it is an element of loss, but Congress never has.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. They may hold it to be and may not. The Secretary of the Interior with his able legal advisers say that it is not an element of loss within the purview of the law.

Mr. UNDERHILL. When the Committee on Claims reports a bill of this character it is always written in the bill that no interest shall be allowed on the claim.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The original act provided that the claimants should be compensated in net loss. If the courts construe "net loss" and say interest on borrowed capital is net loss, then that was the intention of Congress.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That does not necessarily follow, because Congress has taken the position time and time again that it will not pay interest. It has taken that position with regard to admiralty claims.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I grant that the gentleman is right as an abstract proposition.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. But Congress used the words "net loss." It is not up to the Congress to say; it is now up to the courts.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The court is going to say that Congress meant interest when as a matter of fact Congress never intended to mean interest.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. Under the law as it now reads this whole proposition, both law and fact, was put up to the Secretary of the Interior, with no appeal whatever from his decision. No matter how wrong the Secretary might be there was no appeal. All this bill does is to permit an appeal to be taken from an administrative official—a subordinate, if you please, because they write the opinions there—to the courts. Am I correct?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. To construe the law, the law alone.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will go along with the gentleman that far—that they have the right to have their day in court—but I do not believe this question of interest should enter into it.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. NEWTON. I do not so understand that this bill attempts to define any term in the existing law. It takes the law as it was written and says the claimant shall have the right to an appeal to the court.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. This bill does not enlarge the law at all. It merely gives the claimant the right to go to the court to construe the law.

Mr. UNDERHILL. And to collect interest.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I do not know what the court will say.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. BEGG. What I think perhaps the rest of the membership would like to know is this: As I got the statement from the gentleman there are two bases of discontent on the part of the claimant. One is that the Secretary of the Interior has refused to allow interest on the money lost——

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. No.

Mr. BEGG. That is what I got.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. To allow repayment of interest on money that was borrowed to go into this business.

Mr. BEGG. To gamble with.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. No; to produce these minerals.

Mr. BEGG. That is gambling, like an oil proposition; that is what I call it. I would like to ask another thing, if there was not a contention as I understand it, or disaffection by the claimant because the Secretary of the Interior says, "No; we will not pay back the money you spent to buy so many acres of land you thought had minerals on it and afterwards proved not to have them." That is the whole thing——

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. No; wait a minute.

Mr. BEGG. Then let somebody who knows something about it tell about it.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Wait a minute. These people bought land, the war closed, and the Government quit buying and there was no market for the minerals.

Mr. BEGG. The demand?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. So that the money put into it was lost and——

Mr. BEGG. They still owned the land, did not they?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Of course, but it is worthless. The gentleman can see their situation.

Mr. BEGG. Is not that exactly what I said?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The reason this act was passed in the first place, Congress had passed an act in 1918 called the war minerals act and urged all the people to go into the production of certain minerals, and hung up a fund of $50,000,000 and said, "We will take care of your losses if you will produce these minerals that can not be produced in peace time which we need so much to win the war." We cut out buying these minerals from Spain and other countries. Our people went into this mining business. The war ceased. The market was cut off and these people were left flat. Congress recognized the justice of their claims in 1919 and passed this appropriation of $8,500,000.

Mr. ARENTZ. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] that he overlooks the most important phase of this question. The reason for placing an embargo on metals produced outside of the United States was the taking of our ships off that trade and allowing a higher price to be paid for minerals produced in the United States, so that these ships could go into the transport service carrying men and supplies to the men at the war front.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, a division.

The SPEAKER. As many as favor the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill will rise and stand until they are counted.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 116, noes 38.

The SPEAKER. Two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules are suspended and the bill is passed.

Mr. SCHAFER and Mr. KETCHAM made the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty Members are present, not a quorum. The roll call is automatic. Those who favor the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 199, nays 71, not voting 158, as follows:

FARM RELIEF

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker and fellow Members of the House, as the date of adjournment draws nearer, I desire to again call the attention of my colleagues to the urgent necessity of the Congress passing some reasonable measure which will go to the relief of the agricultural interests of our Nation. By a brief reference to statistics compiled for this great industry, one can readily see that it is suffering a continued depression, and this depression has been growing more for the past eight years. By reference to a tabulation recently compiled by the Department of Agriculture, we find a decline in the market value of many of the basic agricultural products and we also find an incline to an alarming extent of farm indebtedness.

As compiled by the Bureau of the Census, the amount of mortgage indebtedness as reported for owner-operated farms in 1920 was $4,003,767,192. In 1925 this had increased to $4,517,258,689. We find also that the bankruptcies in the farming industry in 1921 amounted to 1,363, and in 1928, 5,678; therefore farm bankruptcies per thousand farms in 1921 was 0.21 and in 1928, 0.89. If we will calculate the total farm losses, including bankruptcies, mortgages, crop failures, depreciation, and general indebtedness, we will find that to-day the farming interests of our Nation has approximately $30,000,000,000 deficit for the past 8 or 10 years; and now, my friends, any industry whose balance on the wrong side of the ledger amounts to some $4,000,000,000 annually for 8 years surely is entitled to the most careful and sane consideration of the Congress. No industry can suffer such continued losses and survive.

The farm population was estimated in 1921 as 30,600,000, or almost one-third of the total population of the United States. In 1928 it was estimated at 27,699,000. Thus you will see a decline of more than 3,000,000 in the farm population during the past eight years. We find also that in 1920 the farm acreage was estimated at 955,883,715 acres, and in 1925, 924,319,352 acres. Since 1925 the acreage has decreased. The increase in the use of labor-saving farm machinery has, of course, had a tendency to reduce the farm population, but not to the alarming extent of 3,000,000 persons in eight years. Inasmuch as the acreage is decreasing, of course the farm machinery is not accounting for all of the loss in farm population. The chief reason for the decrease in farm population is the inability under existing economic conditions for farms to be self-supporting and make profits.

Millions of our farmers are farming at a loss each year. We find that the crop values in 1920–21 amounted to $12,668,000,000 and in 1927–28 they were about $12,253,000,000, although many of the staple crops increased in output.

My friends, something is radically wrong with an industry which defaults in this manner. The low net wages earned by the farmer or farm hand as compared to the earnings of persons employed in factories and other lines of endeavor account largely for the decrease in rural population. In 1919–20 farm hands on an average throughout the country, by the year, earned $681. This is without board. Those employed in factories earned $1,279 annually. In 1927–28 farm hands earned, on the average, $584, while the factory hand earned $1,301. Thus you will see a decrease in the wage of the farm hand and an increase in the wage of the factory hand; and this is caused, my friends, by organization of factory and industrial employees and the lack of organization by farm employees, and further caused by the fact that the various industries, factories, railways, and, in fact, almost every line of industry and their employees, are protected by Federal legislation, while heretofore the Government has not seen fit to extend its great arm of support and protection to the farmers and their employees. If this great decrease in farm wages and increase in factory wages should continue for a little while longer, the rural population will be exterminated, and you will have a nation wholly dependent upon outside production to supply the demands of its industrial employees. On the farm also, the average farm hand probably works 10 to 12 hours a day, and other employees, protected by the Federal Government, work from 6 to 8 hours a day; thus the difference, my friends, brought about through Government protection and organization.

Now, I am not in favor of in any manner reducing the earnings of those employed in other lines of industry; what I am in favor of is through proper legislation the Government raising the agricultural industry to a level with the other industries of our Nation and thus enabling farm wages to be raised on a parity with other wages. By doing this, rural life would be developed and would be made as attractive as other lines of industry.

It is interesting to note that farm mortgages and indebtedness are greater in some sections of our country than in others. In the New England States, for instance, the average farm mortgage indebtedness is 33.7 per cent; the Middle Atlantic States, including New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, is 31.8 per cent; the east North Central States of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Wisconsin have an average mortgage indebtedness of 39.5 per cent; while the west Northern Central States of Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas have an average mortgage indebtedness of 51.2 per cent, or more than half the value. The South Atlantic States from Delaware to Florida have only 20.8 per cent mortgage indebtedness. The South Central States from Kentucky to Mississippi have 24.1; the west South Central States from Arkansas to Texas have 35.7; the Rocky Mountain States have the high mortgage indebtedness of 47.4, almost half their total value; and the Pacific States 46 per cent. My State of Florida is third lowest in farm mortgage indebtedness, the average being 19.4 per cent. West Virginia, a factory State, has 12.1 per cent, and Virginia 18.9 per cent. I believe the highest mortgage indebtedness exists in the State of North Dakota, which is 63.8 per cent; South Dakota has 62.4 per cent; Iowa has 55.6 per cent; Nebraska 56.5 per cent; and yet some of those splendid western Republican colleagues of mine who are stalwarts on the Agricultural Committee so far, have failed to enact farm-relief legislation. This mortgage indebtedness has reference to the farms owned by the farmers themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I note with considerable pride that only two States have a smaller farm-mortgage indebtedness than my State of Florida. I would also call to the attention of my colleagues, with the same pride, to the fact that Florida has, according to the latest figures that I have been able to obtain, the highest average annual acre crop value of any State in the Union. The average annual per acre value of Florida crops is $107. The next highest is California, with $79; Massachusetts and New Jersey, each $73; Connecticut, $66; Colorado, $62; and from here the values of the various States decrease until the last one is reported at $11 per acre. It is also of interest to note that this $11 average annual acre yield is one of those States which has one of the very highest farm-mortgage indebtedness averages. It is awfully hard for a farmer who lives in a State two-thirds of whose farms are mortgaged and whose average crop-acre value is $11 to compete with a State whose average farm-mortgage indebtedness is less than 20 per cent, and whose acre yield is $107. Something is radically wrong with American agriculture; and my colleagues who live in these States where indebtedness is so heavy, losses so great, and crop values so small will continue to lose hundreds of their farmers every year to Florida and other lucrative States unless the Congress passes a general farm law which will raise the wage and economic standard of the farmer.

I would like to remind my colleagues that Florida has more than 35,000,000 acres of land, less than 3,000,000 of which are now under cultivation. Almost all of the remaining 33,000,000 acres are tillable. Florida's agricultural products for 1927–28 season were valued at $140,000,000. It furnishes about 80 per cent of the Nation's grapefruit; 60 per cent of the Nation's eggplants; 40 per cent of the table cucumbers; 40 per cent of the snap beans; 65 per cent of the peppers; 32 per cent of the celery; 25 per cent of the tomatoes; 10 per cent of the early Irish potatoes; and a large percentage of the other vegetables, as well as staple crops which are consumed by our Nation. Some of the largest tobacco fields in the country are to be found in my own congressional district, and also extensive pecan groves as well as vast acreage of watermelons. Dairying and the livestock and poultry industries are also rapidly growing.

Florida has no bonded or State indebtedness, no inheritance tax, no income tax, no corporation tax, no corporation transfer tax, no severance tax, no franchise tax, and no tax on intangibles; and her real hope rests in her productive soil and unparalleled climate. Why, my friends, during the present season Florida peppers have sold as high as $15 per crate on the New York market, the highest price ever obtained. A carload at these prices would bring $5,000. Avocado pears produced in the Everglades section have recently sold as high as $25 per crate. Almost all of Florida's soil is rich compared to the soils of other States. It is not unusual for vegetable crops to be placed on the market 10 to 12 weeks after the seed are planted in the ground. Of course, these high prices just mentioned by me do not prevail during an entire season, and very often on account of the lack of Federal marketing facilities our vegetable producers even suffer a loss when the season's crop is taken as a whole; but with proper marketing facilities as could be established by the Federal Government, then the acres which are now tilled in Florida and millions of similar acres in Florida could and would produce the entire Nation's need and supply of fall, winter, and spring vegetables. Why, it is not at all unusual to obtain $20 for a crate of 32 quarts of strawberries on the platform at Lawtey or Starke, Fla. Millions of acres of land in this vicinity and in other sections of our State could be brought in for profitable strawberry production if the Government would provide a competent system of marketing and if the Interstate Commerce Commission would regulate freight and express rates from our local platforms to the northern, western, and eastern markets.

One of Florida's great productions is that of citrus fruits. This season her citrus crop may run as high as 20,000,000 bushels. That of California and Texas combined may run even greater; but even so, if this fruit had been and could be properly distributed among the individual citizens of the United States only a few oranges and a few grapefruit would be available for each individual. The people throughout the United States are demanding fresh vegetables and fresh citrus fruits as well as other fruits, and yet our marketing facilities are not such as to carry the supply to answer the demand. Florida has something like 75,000 acres planted to grapefruit trees, about 55,000 of which are bearing. She has approximately 170,000 acres planted to orange trees, with about 100,000 bearing, different varieties producing grapefruit and oranges for the market at different times of the year.

For example, the early varieties of oranges placed on the market from November to January are such as Parsons, Temples, and Enterprise; midseason varieties from January to March, Seedlings and Pineapples; late varieties from March to January, Valencias, Lue Gim Gongs, and other varieties. The citrus industry will always be one of Florida's most important, owing to the growth in popularity of this fruit, and also owing to the peculiar soil and climatic conditions necessary for its proper production. Florida has both.

Of particular interest and benefit to the Nation is the use recently of citrus fruits, particularly grapefruit, as a diet to counteract influenza. Florida's Citrus Growers Clearing House Association, which is a new and splendid organization for the orderly and effective marketing of citrus fruits, recently donated 20 carloads of grapefruit to be used throughout the country as a preventive against influenza. Recently I read an interesting account of Dr. Daniel Hodgdon, experimenting with grapefruit as a protection against influenza. He experimented with 1,100 children in the State of New York in one institution, and the last report that I had was that not a single one of these children had contracted influenza. Doctor Hodgdon attributed their immunity to the abundance of grapefruit and orange juice given to them. Dr. W. A. McKenzie, of Leesburg, Fla., has also recently successfully carried on through the State of Florida a crusade "Citrus-fruit juice and soda to prevent influenza." I understand that this crusade has had a telling effect and that the number of cases of influenza and deaths from same in the State of Florida were very negligible during the recent epidemic.

The rural life of Florida, my friends, is very interesting. Recently I read where Miss Quinnelle Fuller, of Fort White, Columbia County, Fla., represented Florida at the national health contest held in Chicago in connection with the International Farm Demonstration Club Congress last December. This young lady scored 98.2. Her showing at this contest was a result of her own prudence, Florida's matchless climate and rural life, and the effective results of the home demonstration agents found throughout the State of Florida. There are at present more than 5,000 club girls in the State of Florida, as well as thousands of farm club boys.

The home demonstration and farm demonstration clubs, through the training and development of the youth of the rural communities, are rehabilitating the rural life of our country, and, after all, Mr. Speaker, the rural citizenship is the most dependable of all in our Nation. They live close to nature and by the sweat of their honest brow labor beneath God's blue skies and wring their living from Mother Earth. They here dwell and commune with nature and the finer things of life. The chances for social and moral corruption are fewer, their temptations are not so many, and their inbred ability for self-sacrifice and service to mankind is greater. They are vigorous in heart, in body, and in soul, and really, after all, they represent the most stable, dependable, and best citizenship of our land. Our rural citizenship deserves so much and yet receives so little.

While I know it is impossible for the Congress to pass a bill which would immediately bring the farm wage standard up to that of industry, I do know, however, that if the Government would set up a comprehensive and effective marketing system whereby the agricultural products would find their way to the consumer without the middleman grafting, profiting, and swindling the producer, that things would at once take an incline. In our country, as I see it, we have not a problem of overproduction. Our problem is that of proper and effective distribution. The approximately 120,000,000 people in America would readily consume almost every product of the American farmers if same were conveyed to the consumer at the proper time and less the overhead and middleman expenses. Recently, my friends, I priced shirts in the local market and found that the shirt offered for $2 to the customer had in it cotton material for which the farmer received less than 20 cents. I also found that the hide that went to make a $10 pair of shoes brought to the man who raised the beef which gave the hide less than $1. And do you mean to tell me that these conditions represent a safe and sane economic balance? When pork and beef sell across the counter for 50 cents to the consumer and yet the man who raised the hog or the cow receives 6 cents or 7 cents per pound, would you say that that is a safe economic balance?

My friends, surely this is a situation which proper legislation can remedy, and we owe it to the American farmer to do as much by him and for him as has been done for the big corporation and the various industries, and I for one expect to fight his battle and work for his relief as long as I am able to raise my voice. You may build in the rural communities schools, roads, power lines, install telephones, offer labor-saving machinery, or what not, but he will run a losing race until the proper machinery is set up for him to market his products at a reasonable price. In my State, and in fact throughout the Nation, the farmers are groaning under the heavy burden of taxation. Their taxes are increasing every year and yet in almost every instance the price of the product he sells is declining every year. The number of mortgages and the number of bankruptcies in the farm areas is increasing along with the taxes every year, and unless the Congress will pay less heed to greed and monopoly and more heed to the needs of the agricultural interests of our Nation, soon the rural life of our Nation will be extinct.

My colleagues remember that only the last session of Congress there was a measure before the House which would have done more to relieve the farmers, particularly the southern farmers, than any measure which has been before the Congress in a decade. I have reference to the bill which would have converted Muscle Shoals into a great fertilizer producing plant. This, my friends, as you know, was only in accordance with the intention of the Congress several years ago when approximately $150,000,000 of the taxpayers' money was spent on Muscle Shoals. Muscle Shoals was developed primarily for the manufacture of explosives (ammunition) in time of war and for fertilizers in the time of peace, and our bill which we passed last session had for its purpose the carrying out of the intent of the Congress which appropriated the money for the development of Muscle Shoals; but what was the result? It met death at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue at the desk of your Republican President. The President refused to sign this bill which would have promptly provided for the production of fertilizer at Muscle Shoals.

If this bill had gone into effect instead of the millions of dollars which are now bled from the farmers of the Nation for Chilean nitrates and for other foreign fertilizer monopolies, leaving our country for the benefit of the few, these moneys would have remained in the pockets of our farmers. If this bill had gone into effect in all probability in 1929 the farmers of this Nation would have paid approximately one-half for fertilizer that was paid in 1928 and other years before 1928. Instead of the farmers of my little county donating approximately $100,000 in 1929 to these fertilizer barons, they would have expended probably $50,000 and obtained an even better grade of fertilizer. For almost all southern soils fertilizer is essential. In almost every soil there is absent one or more of the necessary plant foods which must be supplied by commercial or other fertilizer.

If the Congress would pass another bill to convert Muscle Shoals into a fertilizer-manufacturing plant, the President's wishes to the contrary notwithstanding, great benefit would come to the American farmers. I strongly urge the passage of such a bill, and it would give me pleasure to vote for same over the President's veto. It is not a sound financial policy to spend $150,000,000 of the American taxpayers' money to develop Muscle Shoals and then permit it to remain idle because a few individuals desire to continue to graft on the American farmers. It is not too late for my Republican colleagues to yet serve the interest of the American farmer. By the prompt passage of this bill over the President's veto you would be keeping faith with the American farmer. I hope you will promptly bring it to the House for a vote.

President-elect Hoover is pledged to call an extra session of Congress, if necessary, for the passage of a farm bill, but why wait for an extra session? The House apparently has time a plenty to act on farm relief before the adjournment March 4, and what is more pressing or deserving of the time of the House than farm relief? In my opinion the time of the House could be no better spent than in the prompt passage of an effective marketing bill whereby the 1929 crops of the American farmers could be marketed at a living price; therefore I most respectfully urge that the Agricultural Committee promptly report the farm relief bill to the House for immediate action. I am tired of your red tape and delay. Our people need and demand immediate action. You have waited too long already, and may I admonish you that you can not continue to fool the American farmers. They are intelligent, they read and know things, they know their own needs, and I know it is time for the Congress to say less and do more. I urge immediate action. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by inserting some figures relating to agriculture compiled by the Department of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks and incorporate therein some figures relating to agriculture. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did not hear the gentleman's request.

Mr. GREEN. I would like to say to my friend from Wisconsin that I desire to incorporate in my remarks some figures compiled on agriculture by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SCHAFER. There is nothing in the gentleman's remarks relating to the prohibition question?

Mr. GREEN. There is not in this speech.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered by Senator REED. Is there objection?

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address delivered by Senator DAVID A. REED, of Pennsylvania, before the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense at Memorial Continental Hall on January 30, 1929:

IMMIGRATION

Senator DAVID A. REED. It is a very great pleasure to be here, Madam President, a very great privilege to be able to speak on a topic which is so close to my heart. I suppose that every patriotic society in America is interested in the problem of the regulation of immigration because, after all, we realize instinctively that there is not much difference between throngs of aliens coming in troop ships with guns in their hands and throngs of aliens coming in the steerage, coming peaceably but coming to stay and to make this their place of permanent home.

All through history, and before history began I suppose, it has been true that men wanted to migrate to where the most fertile fields could be found. To-day in America we have the most fertile of all the fields in the world, figuratively speaking. It is easier to earn a living in this great country of ours, a comfortable living, than in any other spot on earth. Of course people want to come here; of course the pressure is terrific. The number of registered applicants for emigration from Italy to the United States is understood to be more than two hundred times the present annual quota for that country. It would take 200 years, if not another applicant were to present himself and if they were all to live, to get in those who have already registered their desire to come into the United States under the quota. And think of the hundreds of thousands who have not registered because of the hopelessness of it. And what is true of Italy is similarly true of Poland, of Yugoslavia, and of all those Balkan countries, where life is hard, where agriculture is difficult, where the wage-scale is low. It is true of all the countries of eastern and southeastern Europe. To them America is the great magnet, and half of the population of those countries would be here if their wish could come true.

Now, if they did come, it is very obvious that they would bring down our scale of living; it is obvious that we would have long lines of applicants at the employment office of every industry. It is obvious that they would bring with them different ideas of government from our own.

We hear all this talk about immigration. People think sometimes that we are pretending that we are so immeasurably superior to those people—that that is the reason we do not want them. Well, that is not the theory on which we can base our policy. We Americans can not yet say that our artistic history is comparable with that of Italy, for example. Italy has 20 centuries of glorious past. We have not more than a century and half of real permanent civilization. We can not pretend that the past pictures us as better people than they; but we can say, and say with sincerity and truth, that their outlook is different from ours. We can say that we have learned self-government, we Americans, because for centuries past our ancestors went to the primary school of self-government, went through all the mistakes that people who undertake self-government are bound to go through; and our ancestors and ourselves have learned to govern ourselves with a fair degree of self-restraint simply because we have been at it for generations and generations.

So it is natural and it is right that we should say that we do not want this country filled with Arabs, who have lived always under a patriarchal government, where the common man did not even dare whisper his views of governmental affairs. We are not ready to throw America over to the control of people whose point of view is so radically different from ours and to whom our system is so unsuited. We do not claim that we are better than the Arab or the Eskimo or the Chinaman. It is sufficient for us to say that they do not fit into the scheme of things we have here in America. [Applause.]

Let us take that for our first postulate; that we are not claiming to be any better than anybody else; all we claim is that we are a little bit different and that we have got a vastly different theory and practice of governing ourselves, and that we have an adequate population here. There are enough of us to people this land of ours sufficiently and we do not want to be overcrowded, and, inasmuch as we got here first, we have a right to say who is going to come in the future. [Applause.]

Now, one might ask, Was not this all settled five or six years ago? Didn't we pass an immigration restriction law? Why should this man be taking our time to talk about a subject that has been settled? Well, that is true, my friends. In 1924 we did pass a permanent law to restrict immigration, but it has given great dissatisfaction to throngs of people who have relatives abroad. Very naturally they want to bring them in, and, of course, if they do bring them in, then they in their turn would have a crowd of relatives they would want to bring in. It would be an endless chain, too, for the people who are here and who have cousins and uncles and aunts abroad and want to bring them to America would involve countless others. It is natural that they should resent the present system that says they must not.

So they have begun a serious and determined attack, not on the essential principle of restriction, because they know that they can not beat that down now, but they have begun to whittle away at the methods by which we determine the quotas; and it seems to me to be so serious that I want to explain to you what is going on and why it threatens danger to the whole system of immigration restriction.

When we came to pass the law it was obvious that the total immigration that was to be permitted, which was about 160,000, had to be divided among different countries somehow. You could not just arbitrarily say to Great Britain, "You get 10,000," and say to Germany, "You get 10,000," and so on. The quotas would be too small for some countries and far too big for others. So a rule of thumb was adopted, temporarily and only temporarily, that we would base the quotas on the number of foreign-born people who were in the census of

Now, it was that feeling, not that we were better than this recently arrived immigrant—though we demand of him as much as we concede to him, that he recognize that we are just as good as he is—that feeling caused us to insist, when that law was drawn, that it was all right, temporarily, to base our quotas on the number of foreign born in any census that we wanted to take. But for a permanent system we say that, if it is possible, we must take into account the whole population of this country and make the quotas as nearly like the composition of the whole Nation as it is possible for the scientists in the Census Bureau to make them.

"Well, of course," say the critics, "you can not take DAVID REED and trace him back and find out how much of him is English and how much of him is Irish, although we suspect there is a lot of Irish in him." [Laughter.] They say it is impossible to analyze each individual and get the composition of the nation in that way. And, of course, we readily admit you can not. Most people who have not given particular study to genealogy, and some who have, do not really know who their ancestors were or from what country they came.

But it is perfectly easy to do it the other way about. We know how many people were here in 1790, because they took a census then; and that census has been studied with the greatest care by learned men for many years before immigration regulation came to be an acute question. As far back as 1910 an analysis was made officially by the Census Bureau of the composition of the population of 1790. We have had a census every 10 years since, and we have kept careful records of immigration for over a century. We have kept careful records of emigration—which has been comparatively small—for many years. We know, as closely as we can know anything, just how many people of each nationality there were here in any particular year since 1492, and it is perfectly easy for the scientists to calculate the factor of increase, as they call it. They tell us, for example, that each person who was here in 1790 is represented to-day, on the average, by 13 descendants. So one Englishman living in America in 1790—of course, they were about 90 per cent of the population then—you can say is represented to-day by an equivalent of 13 units or persons in the population of to-day. That has been calculated with the utmost care. Of course, it can not be precise, but no method can be precise. Even this temporary basis I spoke of is hopelessly vague, because in 1890 there was not any Poland and there was not any Lithuania and there was not any Czechoslovakia or Yugoslavia; in 1890 the boundaries of Austria were vastly different and the boundaries of Germany were vastly different.

The boundaries of nearly every state in Europe that was in the last war were different then from what they are now; and it is a wild guess, at the best, when we try to say how many foreign-born people were here in 1890 from, let us say, Poland. Of course, it is a guess; any method is a guess. But the most undiscriminatory method that has been suggested is this one of taking the whole population. And it is the very essence and heart of the immigration law, in my judgment, that we keep it free of discrimination. So long as we can keep that law free of discrimination and so long as we can say to the German, to the Pole, to the Englishman, "We are treating you on a basis of exact equality; we are treating everybody in the United States on a basis of exact equality; we are treating ourselves, whose ancestors fought for America throughout the last 150 years, exactly as we are treating the Syrian who arrived in our ports yesterday,"—certainly they can not ask more than that. We are not discriminating here between native born and foreign born, between citizen and alien even, though the alien certainly has no vested right to be considered at all. [Applause]. But we have been generous enough to take the native born, the naturalized American, and the unnaturalized resident and consider them all on an equality in fixing these quotas and to make no discrimination whatsoever between any two foreign countries except those in the barred zone.

I have not stopped to talk about the Asiatic restrictions that keep out Malays, Chinese, Siamese—people of that sort. It is not necessary, because that is a settled question. It seems to be for the good of America that that should remain a settled question. I have not talked either about the absence of a quota for Africa. The negro element of our population does not desire further immigration from Africa, and they do not regard it as an injustice, and they agree with us on the wisdom of having no further immigration from that source. Those questions are closed.

But as to that part of the world from which we do permit immigration, as I say, we have gone to the extreme in trying to work out a system which does not discriminate between men or between nations. Now, if we can hold that our law is safe. If that goes—and that is the thing that is being talked now by certain foreign groups, on the ground that putting that into effect will reduce their present temporary quotas. They assume that that is unjust; of course the contrary is the fact, for at the present time they are getting too much under the temporary quotas. If we can hold this essential feature of the law and keep it nondiscriminatory, then there can not be a successful attack upon our present policy, and we will keep the America of our grandchildren and their grandchildren the same as the America that we see to-day. [Applause.] And it will still be speaking English and it will still have the same standards of right and wrong. [Applause.] It will still be a land where women do not work in the fields; it will still be a land where equality means something more than a catch-vote phrase for politicians to use. [Applause.]

But don't you see if they could once get rid of that nondiscriminating system, so as to furnish a basis for claiming that Italians, for example, or that Germans, for example, or any nationality is being unfairly dealt with, then there would be put into the hands of these foreign groups at election time one of the most dangerous of all possible weapons. Every politician, with occasional exceptions, is a coward. [Laughter.] The finest flower of his cowardice blooms around election time and if any foreign-born group, of whatever origin, can come to him and say to him: "In our language papers we are going to turn the solid Eskimo vote out against you unless you will agree to pledge yourself to break down this unfair restriction of immigration"; the average politician will say, "Yes, my dear people; I have been worried about that for a long time; I am with you." And we have all seen it happen.

So it is up to us Americans who do not hyphenate our allegiance, who own no foreign allegiance, who look to America as our only country. We are the arbiters in this thing. [Applause.] It is for us now and in the years to come to insist that the law stand as it is, discriminating against nobody, and that it be not broken down by the influence of these stories of human interest, as they call them, which they have set out to collect. Many of them are pitiful stories that do really touch one's heart; but we must not allow those gates to be thrown wide open again for the admission of the trash of Europe, the people who are excused from serving jail sentences if they agree to emigrate. That is the kind of people that will come if once we give in to the appeal that is made in the name of sentiment. Some of it, as I say, does touch us. We hear of people, old men, old women, without support over there, and we are accused of having separated the family. Why, nobody ever stops to think that it was the relative that came here that separated the family. We did not do it. If he came before there was any restrictive immigration law staring him in the face it is his fault that he is not naturalized by this time. If he came since then he came with his eyes wide open, because he had to pass that barrier himself and get his visa, and he had plenty of actual notice that the immigration law was there to impede the following of these relatives for whom he has become so suddenly solicitous. So we are not being unfair to them, my friends. They have all had plenty of notice, and if those families are separated it is their fault and not yours or mine. [Applause.]

And now I have talked longer than I meant to talk about this. But truly it is so important; it is part of our national defense in peace time; we have got to stick to it. It is just as important as it is to have an adequate army, an adequate navy. We must keep this fortress around our frontier and keep out this vast throng that would come here to change the character of this Nation that we all so dearly love.

I thank you. [Applause and demonstration.]

Mr. MILLER. Will you allow me to ask the Senator, in case the national-origins plan as it is now provided to be applied under our law is repealed, what, in his opinion, will be the quota basis used?

Senator DAVID A. REED. I wish I could answer that. I do not think anybody knows. All the critics of the present plan are voluble but they never suggest anything that is better. Nobody knows what we would do. Nobody has suggested any better basis.

May I make a second speech? [Applause.]

You hear so many people saying, "Why do you keep them out by numbers? Why don't you let in just the best?" And that appeals to us—as if we could stop and examine them and talk to them and get their motives for coming here and find out their character, their habits, their religion, and all that. It would be ideal. But the moment we adopt a system of supposed fitness, don't you see how it opens the gates for sheer political pull and all that follows? The consul admits the person who has the biggest pull or offers some other inducement. The Congressman rushes to the State Department and says: "I have a little friend living in the Ghetto over in Poland, and he is a splendid fellow. Really, his character could not be better. I want him to come in—or there will be trouble." That is the way it would work. It is impossible to adopt any system of qualitative examination. No two men would agree on the quality of applicants.

I never could agree with some of my colleagues on the relative merits of this nation or that in the matter of immigration. I am sure that it would lead to chaos. While it looks ideal and simple, it is utterly impossible. [Applause.]

Mrs. BUELL. May I ask the Senator if he will tell us whether he considers the national-origins provision sufficiently accurate for the purposes of this law in which we are so deeply interested?

Senator DAVID A. REED. I do, indeed; and I am fortified in that by the testimony of Dr. Joseph A. Hill, who is the assistant to the Director of the Census, and one of the greatest statisticians and students of population statistics in the world.

Mrs. HARKINS. Senator REED, may I ask if the 1890 census represents very accurately the present population?

Senator DAVID A. REED. No; it does not at all. It gives a fair approximation of the two groups of northwestern Europe as against southeastern Europe, but it is quite unfair in the distribution of the quotas amongst those sections.

For example, about one-sixth of the population of America is of Germanic origin. That is all that is claimed by the German writers themselves, who have written on the German element here—one-sixth of our present population. And yet at present, under the 1890 basis, they have about one-third of all of the immigration that comes to this country. It is manifestly a discrimination against all the others. However, please understand that I cheerfully grant that the average German immigrant is as good as the immigrant of any other nationality. Usually they are law-abiding, peaceful, industrious people, and they make good immigrants, and I am not at all reflecting on them; but it is utterly unfair to give them twice as much representation in the quota as their element in America would call for. [Applause.]

Mrs. HAWKINS. Will the Senator tell us where the opposition to the national-origins originated?

Senator DAVID A. REED. Yes. I am going to be very frank about it. The present opposition comes from the German element and from the Scandinavian elements. Those two have at present a very much larger proportion of the quota than their representation in the American population would entitle them to, and so they are resisting very bitterly the effort to bring it down to the national-origins basis. It is not that their present quota is fair but that they assume that it is, and they assume that to bring it down to normal is an attack on them. As a matter of fact, nothing is further from our thought. I think both of those elements furnish excellent strains of immigration and nothing is further from our desire than to attack them. We want to be fair to them, but not more than fair.

The effort that we heard so much of during the last campaign to bring it up to the 1920 census is backed largely by the Jewish element from Poland and from the countries of southeastern Europe. All of those countries would gain very much by using the 1920 census of foreign born, because in recent years, as we all know, so many people came from those countries that the 1920 census shows a great proportion of foreign-born people from that source.

I thank you. [Applause.]

SUPPLEMENTAL REPORT

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file a supplemental report to House Report No. 2314 on the bill H. R. 16720.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to file a supplemental report on House bill 16720. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, to-day the House passed, by unanimous consent, a resolution from the Senate which I believe every Member was honored and pleased to vote for. The resolution extended the thanks of Congress to the entire crew of the steamer America. I desire to inquire if, under the rules—and it is better to have the matter settled now, I believe—every member of that crew would have the privilege of the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the proposition is covered in a sentence found in Rule XXXIII, that rule mentioning those who are entitled to the privilege of the floor of the House. After specifying a number of persons, like the President, Vice President, and so forth, there occurs this sentence:

> Such persons as have, by name, received the thanks of Congress.

The Chair thinks that the words "by name" mean literally that they shall be named, and, therefore, it would not cover a class like the captain and crew of a ship.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith an act of the Philippine Legislature amending the corporation law of the Philippine Islands. This law, it being in certain respects in conflict with congressional legislation, requires the affirmative approval of Congress to make it in those parts effective.

The act has been approved by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, it meets the approval of the War Department, and I earnestly recommend that the requisite approval be given by the Congress as speedily as practicable.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 4, 1929.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs and ordered printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment to the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the language proposed by Mr. BORAH insert the following:

First. That the Congress favors a treaty, or treaties, with all the principal maritime nations regulating the conduct of belligerents and neutrals in war at sea, including the inviolability of private property thereon, and embracing as nearly as practicable the principles set forth in article 12 of the treaty of 1785 negotiated between the United States and Prussia, in which negotiations Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and John Adams represented the United States.

Second. That such treaties be negotiated if practically possible prior to the meeting of the conference on the limitation of armaments in 1931.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, after consultation with some of my colleagues and not desiring to prolong the debate, I desire to perfect the amendment by striking out, beginning with the word "and" in line 4, page 1, all the rest of the language contained in the first paragraph, so that the amendment as perfected would read:

First. That the Congress favors a treaty, or treaties, with all the principal maritime nations regulating the conduct of belligerents and neutrals in war at sea, including the inviolability of private property thereon.

Second. That such treaties be negotiated if practically possible prior to the meeting of the conference on the limitation of armaments in 1931.

Unless some one wants an explanation of it, I am ready to let the matter go to a vote.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator explain how the amendment would affect contraband of war?

Mr. REED of Missouri. It has the effect of protecting private property from seizure at sea in accordance with the doctrine for which we have contended from the very beginning of this Government and which we have never waived.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think it would abolish the right of blockade?

Mr. REED of Missouri. No; I do not think it would abolish the right of blockade if it were a real blockade, but I think it would stop the seizure of vessels on the high seas in the manner in which they have been seized; and it would compel respect for private property and have the same effect if it were unjustly interfered with.

Mr. HALE. But it would not stop or interfere with the right of blockade?

Mr. REED of Missouri. No; neither would it abolish contraband as established by the law of nations and treaties. I am simply trying to express a general idea as a mere recommendation of Congress.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, as I understand it, instead of calling a conference to codify or announce international law, the modified amendment proposes to take the same principles and try to achieve the same result by treaty or treaties as proposed in the amendment of the Senator from Idaho. I think it ought to be adopted as modified. All it does, as I understand it, is to propose to treat private property on the seas similar to private property on land. A city may be surrounded and everything prevented from going into it. If that can be done upon the land, the same thing can be done upon the seas. This is a principle for which we have contended from time immemorial. One of the first treaties made by Thomas Jefferson was to protect private property at sea in the same way that private property on land is protected. If we can do this, one of the great modern improvements of civilization will ultimately be achieved.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am in entire accord with the amendment; but I would like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Missouri with regard to it. This question arose in my mind: Suppose the private property were contraband? In other words, I am wondering if the amendment does not include more than the amendment intended. Nobody would contend that contraband of war should be protected upon the sea, but the amendment says that it includes "inviolability of private property" on the sea. Suppose a private individual were shipping guns and ammunition; technically would not that be included in the suggested amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. I would not think so on the theory that private property would not be inviolable if it were contraband of war. I do not know why it should be protected if it were at sea any more than if it were on land destined, for instance, to a city under siege. The object is to treat private property on land and sea similarly.

Mr. NORRIS. There is nothing said here about private property on land.

Mr. SWANSON. This expression will not have the force of law; it is simply a suggestion made to carry out the idea we have in mind.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; and, of course, it is not a serious matter, because in any negotiations which might take place under this provision the question could probably easily be met; but so long as we are going to state our position, ought we not to exclude from the term "private property" contraband of war?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The modification of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri was made by him in order to relieve against the very question which the Senator from Nebraska has raised. Some question arose in the minds of a number of Senators as to whether the particular allusion to a certain paragraph of the treaty of 1785 would not commit the Congress to the policy of complete abolishment of contraband; and so the amendment was framed as it now is.

As I see it now, the language of the amendment being merely advisory, is broad enough to commend any negotiation which this Government may see fit to inaugurate tending to the protection of private neutral property on the high seas in time of war.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I have stated, this provision will not have the force of law; it will simply afford a basis for negotiations. At the same time, if we can just as well as not, we ought to state our position definitely.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I understand the Senator's suggestion; but the difficulty of saying "private property other than contraband" grows out of the fact that during recent years certain nations have attempted to expand the rules relating to contraband so as to embrace the necessities of life, so as to embrace commodities and articles which under the law of nations are not fairly included within the term "contraband." We thought it best—or at least I thought it best—in consideration of the matter to leave the advice as to the extent and character of the negotiations broad enough to recommend the definition, if need be, of the term "contraband," which I think is embraced within the language as it is now offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas must recognize that my time is limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I certainly do, and I have no disposition to take the Senator's time. I apologize to him. I can take the floor later myself.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know that I care to consume my entire 10 minutes; but, with due respect for what the Senator from Arkansas has said, still to me the necessity, if there is such a necessity, is not obvious. I myself do not believe there is such a necessity, but it is advisable, I think, if we can, to be perfectly explicit in our suggestion here. If we can do that, I think we ought to do it.

It is true that during the World War Great Britain particularly broadened contraband of war, and new inventions may of necessity broaden it more in the future. I would not think it advisable here to try to define "contraband of war." If we are to enter into negotiations under the language of the pending amendment, we shall have that difficulty in any case very likely and it will probably be a serious difficulty, a difficulty that may prevent any agreement being reached, because that is a very serious matter. As we would like to see it defined, we would not include in contraband of war a great many things that the Government of Great Britain very likely would be anxious to include. Nevertheless, if we take this language for just what it says, it seems to me that on its face it does include something that we probably do not want to include.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I do not think that any addition to the language of the amendment is at all necessary. Of course, it is not attempted in the language used to define all of the limitations or, indeed, any of the limitations upon the general doctrine. The language merely refers to a general theory or policy; and in the textbooks and in the voluminous correspondence in relation to the matter the subject is usually referred to as the "inviolability of private property at sea" or the "immunity from seizure of private property at sea," and it is always understood, when the language is used, that blockade and contraband, of course, are excluded. For instance, in Cheney's International Law, a late work, in considering this question, the whole subject is headed with the following title:

Proposed General Immunity of Enemy Property.

And in the discussion Professor Moore was asked about limitations and he said:

What therefore the United States since 1850 has proposed is not that private property at sea shall be exempt from capture but that it shall be so exempt, subject to the exceptions of contraband and blockade.

So that if we were going to insert in the amendment the words "except contraband," we must also insert "except blockade." But that is all understood. This is merely a proposal for the consideration and discussion of the subject with a view to a treaty. The treaty, of course, when ratified, will have the proper limitations, and that treaty will, in all reasonable probability, as did the treaty of 1785, except contraband of war from its operations.

Mr. President, it might be interesting in this connection to read the appropriate paragraph of the treaty of 1785. It reads as follows:

> * * * all merchant and trading vessels employed in exchanging the products of different places, and thereby rendering the necessaries, conveniences, and comforts of human life more easy to be obtained, and more general, shall be allowed to pass free and unmolested; and neither of the contracting powers shall grant or issue any commission to any private armed vessels, empowering them to take or destroy such trading vessels or interrupt such commerce.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, from what is the Senator reading?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. From the treaty with Prussia of 1785. In the treaty with Italy of 1871 appears the following:

ARTICLE 15

> The liberty of navigation and commerce secured to neutrals by the stipulations of this treaty shall extend to all kinds of merchandise, excepting those only which are distinguished by the name of contraband of war. And, in order to remove all causes of doubt and misunderstanding upon this subject, the contracting parties expressly agree and declare that the following articles, and no others, shall be considered as comprehended under this denomination.

Then the treaty denominates a certain list of articles obviously intended for war purposes. Therefore, I do not believe that we ought to attempt to make any limitation that can be taken care of by law; but what I want to suggest to the Senator from Missouri is that the phrase "including the inviolability of private property thereon" does not make the sentence read very well.

> That the Congress favors a treaty, or treaties, with all the principal maritime nations regulating the conduct of belligerents and neutrals in war at sea, including the inviolability of private property thereon.

In an earlier amendment presented to the Senate that was expressed in these words, "on the basis of the inviolability of private property," and I suggest to the Senator that such a phrase be employed.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I have the greatest respect for the Senator's judgment, but if we use the term "embracing" it would seem to be a limitation upon the preceding clause. It may be a better word than "including," but I hardly think the word "embracing" would be proper.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Montana did not use the word "embracing," but the words "on the basis of the inviolability of private property."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I used the words "on the basis of." That is the question that we are discussing; that the maritime law should be revised "on the basis of the inviolability of private property at sea."

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator's suggestion of the words "on the basis of" make the amendment too restricted and confine it to the consideration of the inviolability of property, whereas the expression "regulating the conduct of belligerents and neutrals in war at sea" might affect individual rights as well as property rights? It seems to me that the suggestion of the Senator from Montana, if accepted, would limit the resolution to the consideration of property in contradistinction to the consideration of the rights of individuals upon the high seas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think the language as employed is fairly apt. The idea of the Senator from Montana could probably be incorporated by changing the word "conduct" to "rights," so as to read "the rights of belligerents and neutrals," and so forth. It would seem a little more apt, perhaps, but I think the language the Senator from Missouri has employed expresses the thought.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The significance of the provision ought to be borne in mind. It is intended to abolish the general right of capture of merchant vessels at sea, so that even the vessels of the enemy country would be permitted to pass without interruption so long as they did not carry contraband or attempt to run a blockade.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator why is it necessary at all to incorporate that language in the amendment? Would not a conference that would undertake to define the rights of belligerents and neutrals in war at sea necessarily include a consideration of the very things the Senator has in mind in his suggestion?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly; but I want the Congress again to assert the traditional policy of this country in favor of the exemption from seizure of merchant vessels at sea, because it has been suggested to me that the State Department—I do not know just exactly what that means; it may mean some subordinate—but it has been suggested to me that the State Department, perhaps, has changed its attitude with respect to that matter, and I want the Congress to declare, as I have said, the traditional policy of this country in this regard.

Mr. GEORGE. It seems to me, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, that consideration of the matter which he puts into the amendment could not possibly be avoided if any conference were held.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The negotiators, of course, could take it up without any expression at all on the part of Congress with respect to the policy that it should like to have observed.

Mr. GEORGE. It seems to me that at this time they would undoubtedly take it up. They could not avoid taking up the very thing the Senator has in mind.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But there would be nothing in the nature of instructions from the Congress of the United States. I want to have it perfectly plain that the Congress of the United States is still attached to the traditional policy of the exemption of merchant vessels from seizure at sea.

Mr. GEORGE. Then, does not the Senator come very near the proposition that he does not want a conference at all, but he merely wants to get the nations together to ratify something that we in advance have stated?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not at all. The declaration of the amendment is that the Congress favors treaties embodying that idea.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], as modified, to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, it seems to me that there is a question back of all the questions that have been discussed up to this time in connection with this amendment—that is to say, whether such an amendment as this, either in its original or in its modified form, should be adopted.

We have twice attempted to arrive at an understanding with Great Britain in relation to the general subject of disarmament, and in each instance we have failed to arrive at one under circumstances which, in my opinion, do not involve any moral reproach to Great Britain. She has merely had the good sense to recognize her imperious necessities—necessities with which it was impossible for her, as a matter of self-preservation if nothing else, to temporize.

The Washington conference and the Geneva conference have come to nothing of lasting benefit, and if it is the idea of this amendment that a treaty is to be entered into between Great Britain and the United States with reference to the freedom of the seas—the amendment is silent as to what countries are to be parties to that treaty—in my judgment the negotiations looking to such a treaty will be just as abortive, just as fruitless, just as productive of international distrust, suspicion, and ill feeling as the Geneva conference was.

At the present time there is a commission appointed by the League of Nations for the purpose of codifying international law; and, of course, it will be one of the very first duties of that commission—of which, by the way, one of our most accomplished and distinguished American lawyers, Mr. Wickersham, is a member—to declare what should be the conduct of belligerents and neutrals at sea in time of war. Mind you, that commission, of course, is representative of the whole civilized world, not only of those nations which happen to be members of the League of Nations, but of our country as well.

If the difficult subject of the freedom of the seas is capable of being treated successfully at all, surely it will be at the hands of that commission; and, if I am not mistaken, there is still another commission—I am not certain about that—a commission appointed at the instance of the South American powers perhaps for the purpose of codifying international law. If I am wrong in that impression, I shall be glad to be corrected.

So I say, why anticipate the action of the commission that is to carry on its work of codification under the auspices of the League of Nations; that is to say, under auspices, as I have declared, that are representative of the entire civilized world by preliminary negotiations of a limited nature such as are contemplated by this amendment.

I see nothing to be gained by such negotiations; and I for one so clearly recognize the supreme exigencies of life and death with which the British Empire has to deal in time of war that

I do not wish to place Great Britain again in the position, as I believe she would surely be placed if approached for the purpose of such negotiations, of saying to us that she can not under existing conditions accede to our ideas about the freedom of the seas. We all know that during the War of 1812, when we were insisting upon the freedom of the seas, the clearance papers of our ships that were trading with enemies of Great Britain were often grossly fraudulent. If the doctrine of the freedom of the seas should be accepted and not be as effectually guaranteed as it should be, we would have a repetition of all that fraud when Great Britain was engaged in some life-and-death struggle with some enemy or enemies.

Why, during the World War, I say that it was on the whole just as much to the advantage of the United States as of Great Britain that Great Britain should have interfered, as she did, with American commerce; and whether our illustrious President, Woodrow Wilson, had the sagacity to see that or not, Mr. Walter Hines Page had the sagacity to see it. As much as I admired Woodrow Wilson, I assert that in that particular Mr. Page was the truer statesman of the two. He knew that technically Great Britain was violating our commercial rights; but he had the greatness of mind, the breadth of vision, to realize that what Great Britain was doing was in the long reckoning inuring just as much to our lasting benefit as to that of Great Britain.

Contraband of war? Why, who is there that can define any longer the exceptions that should be made in favor of contraband of war? Is not cotton, that enters so largely into military explosives; is not copper, that is such an important feature of modern military operations; is not rubber, that is a product of equal value in such operations under modern conditions of invention and discovery, just as much contraband as shells, rifles, bayonets, or anything else that has always been considered contraband?

Lloyd George, with his keen perception, said all that England will ever be able to say to the world about this matter of the freedom of the seas under existing conditions when, during the Wilsonian era, he flatly declined to accept the freedom of the seas under such conditions, and insisted that it meant the destruction of the power of blockade—a power which Great Britain would not forego unless and until a league of nations should be established and become a reality.

There is the common sense of the whole situation; and even more luminously, certainly more amply, Lord Balfour, at the Washington conference, developed the same idea.

It is true that the League of Nations has become to no small extent, I am happy to say, a reality as respects all the other great civilized powers of the world but the United States; but, so far as we are concerned, it has not become a reality, and until it does it can not be said to be a reality as respects Great Britain.

If we were a party to the League of Nations in time of war, of course, as Woodrow Wilson so clearly saw, this problem of the freedom of the seas would no longer be an American problem; it would be a problem for the League of Nations, under the covenant which imposes upon it the duty of seeing that any economic boycott decreed by it against a recalcitrant member of the league is duly carried into effect.

So I see nothing to be gained by this amendment, I repeat, either in its original or its amended form. Why create more suspicion, more distrust, more ill feeling between these two great, kindred, peace-loving nations—the two nations upon whose cooperation for the permanent welfare of mankind the future of civilization more than on anything else depends?

Let us have no more preliminary conferences on the subject of disarmament or the subject of the freedom of the seas until those subjects can be taken up by general agencies coextensive with the whole world.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Maryland has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, two phases of this problem prompt me to submit some observations. The effectiveness of the amendment as a method of accomplishing the purpose underlying it is one subject, and the purpose itself is a different one.

I am not so much concerned about the interests of Great Britain or any other foreign nation as I am about the welfare of the United States. It has never seemed to me true that Great Britain was right, and the men who struggled and fell in efforts to maintain the cause of the United States during the War of 1812 were wrong. I never thought any power on this earth had or ought to have the right to seize a ship flying under the flag of my country, take from it by force a seaman supposed to be under the shelter of that flag, and impress him into the service of another country; and it is a strange bent of mind, in my opinion, which justifies opposition to this amendment on that theory—that in the various controversies that have arisen between the United States and Great Britain the mother country has been right and the United States has been wrong.

Aside from any question as to the practical result of this amendment, there underlies it and runs through it a principle the recognition of which is absolutely essential and indispensable to the substantial limitation of naval armament. So long as the subject remains in confusion, so long as it remains doubtful whether a belligerent, a foreign country other than our own—I care not whether it be Great Britain or some other country—in struggling for the continuance of its existence has the right to seize and destroy the commerce of this country without regard to the character of that commerce as recognized by international law, there will be no limitation of naval armament worth while. Battleships and cruisers, submarines and airships, will still be constructed, and they will be constructed in sufficient numbers to sustain the lives, the independence, the interests of the millions who live under the Stars and Stripes.

The effort to negotiate the treaty or treaties contemplated by this amendment may or may not succeed. If it succeeds, it will result in clearing the present situation of great confusion. If it fails, this country and its representatives will realize that the proposal for the limitation of armament is largely a dream.

Is it a matter of indifference to citizens of this country that the right of a foreign power is asserted to disregard the law of nations? Is it a matter of indifference or unconcern that what constitutes private property other than contraband, or what constitutes contraband, is undefined? Is it not worth while trying to reach an agreement and to compose the fundamental controversy which can not be otherwise finally determined? Shall we have no more conferences, as suggested by the Senator from Maryland? Shall we make no more effort for treaties to define the rights and privileges of belligerents and neutrals?

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BRUCE. None until we have a report from this world-wide commission as to what the respective rights of neutrals and belligerents in time of war at sea should be.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the preparatory commission of the League of Nations has been attempting to work out this problem throughout the entire period that has come and gone since the close of the great World War, and the fact that nothing substantial has been accomplished is proof of the great difficulties that exist in the problem. I do not know that the United States is under any obligation to wait, to take no initiative, to refrain from attempting to do anything, to express no opinion, until a commission in which our country is not a direct participant shall arrive at an arrangement or a conclusion.

I do not belittle the difficulty of negotiating a treaty like that contemplated by this amendment. During the Geneva conference, only three nations participating, the United States, Great Britain, and Japan, it was found impossible to agree upon a program, and the preparatory commission of the League of Nations has, throughout the long years of its efforts, been unable to agree upon a program. Some nations wanted limitation of total tonnage. Others want limitation by classes of ships. But it became apparent during the Geneva conference, and more apparent during the discussions of the Anglo-French project, that there will be great difficulty in negotiating or arranging an agreement for the limitation of armaments. But just as sure as you study this subject, you will come to the conclusion that, before there can be an effective limitation of armaments, there must be a definition of rights, and that definition of rights, it is hoped, may be accomplished in part through such a treaty as that proposed in the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired. He has 10 minutes now on the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am not willing to assume that it is hopeless, that it is utterly impossible to enter into any agreement with the principal naval powers defining the rights of neutrals and belligerents at sea. Those rights have been defined in a somewhat confused manner by the customs of past centuries growing out of conflicts long gone by.

The changed conditions which exist respecting commerce and the methods by which it is carried make inevitable some changes in the rules governing commerce at sea. But if this country enters upon the attempt to negotiate a treaty which, if ratified, will remove the difficulty in securing limitation of armament I believe the effort is worth while, even though it meets with only partial success, even though it fails entirely of success.

In this day we owe it to civilization to do everything possible to prevent those clashes and those conflicts which are the outgrowth of conflicting customs, civilizations, and interests. But the fact that the world now has heavier armaments than existed in the pre-war period shows that that state of feeling does not exist in the breasts of the people of the world which is preliminary to true peace and which prevents the world from disarming. The best way to secure disarmament is to bring about the feeling in the breasts of the people that they are secure without arming.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. I would like to ask the Senator whether there is any reason why we should not be willing to await the action of the codification commission of which I have spoken? Is there any reason why the subject of freedom of the seas should not be taken up at the conference of 1931? As I understand it—and I would like to be corrected if I am wrong—Great Britain, the United States, Japan, France, and Italy, at least, will be parties to that conference. That time is not very far off.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the theory of this amendment is that it will help the disarmament conference of 1931 to be effective, if in the meantime a treaty defining the rights of neutrals and belligerents at sea is negotiated. It is intended to be preliminary to the conference of 1931.

That conference will be confronted with great difficulty. It will have some of the same obstacles in the way of its success that existed at the time of the Washington conference. Some of the principal powers represented there were only willing that limitation should be effected which, in its final analysis, would not interfere with the purposes and the plans of those participating. If in 1931 it could be said to the conference, "We now know what is contraband; we know what rights are secured to private property at sea; the wrath and condemnation of the rest of the world will be directed at the nation that violates those rights solemnly agreed upon"; it would be materially helpful to the members of that conference in their efforts to agree upon limitation.

Of course, no man can look into the future and see the effect, the details to be accomplished by an effort of this character, but, differing from the Senator from Maryland almost totally, agreeing to nothing whatever he said, as I remember it, in his remarks just a few minutes ago, while recognizing his superior learning and knowledge of history, I take my position firmly on this ground, that there can be no impropriety in the Congress expressing its opinion on a subject which, say what you will and think what you please, lies close to the heart of every man, woman, and child in this Republic.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, it seems to me this controversy lies in a very narrow compass. There has been a fight almost from the time man emerged from the cave to have private property protected on land. An army would seize the private property of any individual citizen of a nation at war with the country represented by that army. Civilization progressed, and to-day in all warfare there is an inviolability about private property on land, except as to contraband.

Ever since that has been the rule as to property on land an effort has been made by patriotic, liberty-loving, and progressive people the world over to extend to private property on sea the same inviolability and no more that is possessed by private property on land.

Under existing international law, as administered by some nations, in time of war private property in ships is seized and confiscated, and no compensation is given. If the private citizen of a nation not at war permits his private property to be carried on the ship of a belligerent, and the ship is seized, the property may be confiscated. That is not true as to private property on land.

The only object of this amendment is to direct our State Department, or President, to try to negotiate a treaty which will extend to private property on sea the inviolability which applies to private property on land. The term "inviolability" is the best term to use. It is a general legal expression that has been used in diplomatic correspondence, and it seems to me it is a good term.

What has been the attitude of the United States Government in this matter? Ever since the War of 1812 we have insisted that private property on sea should have the same rights as private property on land, and be subject to the same inviolability. Efforts have been made and conferences held looking to that end. A conference was held at Paris, I think in 1856, in which privateering was abolished. In the olden times letters of marque and reprisal were issued, and ships were sent out to seize private property of citizens of any nation at war with the nation granting the letters. That was abolished in 1856. We refused to ratify the Paris conference treaty because it did not protect private property against seizure by government ships of war, though it did protect against seizure by private ships of war. Mr. Marcy, the Democratic Secretary of State at that time, refused to approve the Paris conference, because private property on the sea was still subject to attack and confiscation by public ships.

We have from the foundation of our Government insisted that civilization, that trade, that commerce, that progress, required that no distinction be made between private property on land and private property on sea, and the efforts of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] are directed toward authorizing our President to conduct negotiations, through treaty, to accomplish that purpose.

Treaties must come to the Senate for ratification. This principle is not written in any treaty. This amendment simply emphasizes the line on which we desire that negotiations be conducted, so as to give to private property on sea the inviolability that appertains to private property on land.

What nation is more interested in that than ours? Annually the sea-borne commerce of the United States amounts to $14,000,000,000. If there is any nation in the world whose citizens have upon the sea private property—valuable, far-reaching, and scattered everywhere—that is subject to danger from warfare upon the sea, it is the United States, and if any nation would be benefited by extending to private property on sea the inviolability possessed by private property on land, the greatest beneficiary of that policy, above all other nations, would be the United States, which has the greatest sea-borne commerce in the world.

I do not wish to load the bill down with a lot of amendments and declarations of principles and policies that will jeopardize it, but I can see no reason why the President should not have called to his attention the desirability of conducting negotiations for treaties to extend to private property on the seas the same rights possessed by private property on land.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator conceive that any set of conferees would leave out of consideration the principle for which we have contended since the War of 1812? How would we possibly exclude from a conference such a principle?

Mr. SWANSON. I can see no excuse for not agreeing to the amendment if it is conceded that the principle is going to be considered. It will merely give it emphasis. Sometimes emphasis accomplishes results, and I see no objection to emphasizing what has been in the minds and hearts of the American people since 1812, as suggested by the Senator from Georgia. The occasion exists to-day greater than then for the adoption of such a principle. The violation of the principle has brought on more warfare almost than the violation of any other principle; that is, the wrong treatment of private property on the sea. It seems to me there can be no objection to the existing amendment of the Senator from Missouri offered as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Idaho. In addition to that, I may say that an amendment substantially like this was accepted before the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into for limitation of debate, and I feel, since that was done, that the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I am not disposed to make any point about it, but it seems to me the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri is violative of the unanimous-consent agreement already entered into. The modification was made after 4 o'clock p. m. yesterday. I am not disposed to press the point. It is merely a technical point.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The unanimous-consent agreement does not preclude a modification of amendments. Otherwise the Senate would not have the power to change any amendment whatsoever.

Mr. BRUCE. That was the very point raised by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], and I think the point is well taken, that we would not have the power to do that very thing unless the Senate included the power expressly in the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senate has just as much power over an amendment proposed before 4 o'clock yesterday under the unanimous-consent agreement as it would have if no unanimous-consent agreement had been entered into.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not press the point at all. It is a mere technical point.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to say on the point of order that I have always understood that when the offering of amendments was prohibited after a certain hour, such as 4 o'clock in the present case, all amendments were received subject to parliamentary law; that is, we could offer amendments to the second degree, but could not offer to the third degree or offer a new amendment, but that the original amendment was subject to parliamentary law. That is the interpretation placed upon such unanimous-consent agreements, as I have understood it, in connection with amendments that had to be offered by a certain time.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I would like the privilege of stating my reasons for offering the substitute which in its present form is but little different from the amendment originally offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], except that it proposes what I believe is a practical way to approach the question—namely, not through a codification of law which will indeed prove a very difficult thing to accomplish, because to codify all international law means many conferences and perhaps the lapse of many years of time, whereas under the present proposal if the principal maritime nations can be induced to sign treaties providing for what we commonly call the freedom of the seas, I believe that result can be accomplished—perhaps not in a day or in a year, but if persisted in, it can be brought about.

One of my reasons for that opinion is that the interests of nations lie on that side of the balance. It is indeed a thing almost impossible of understanding that, throughout the course of the years, when two nations are engaged in a war they shall exercise the power, not the right, of interfering with the commerce of nations in no manner concerned in the war and in no way responsible for its existence. It is as though two men engaged in a personal difficulty should see fit to undertake to shut off the trade or commerce of an entire community when all of the other citizens of the community desire to pursue their peaceful way without interference.

The right has always been exercised, not as a matter of justice, but as a power backed by the greatest amount of force. It is not a new pretense, but in every age when this doctrine has been asserted, back in the days of ancient Athens, in the days of Pericles and on down through the centuries, nations that have had the greatest power at sea proceeded ruthlessly against the commerce of the world whenever it deemed it necessary to do so in its own interests when it was involved in a war.

Attempts have been made to arrive at agreements. What we have called international law, for want of a better name, has in the past undertaken to define contraband. But we have found that the more powerful nations upon the sea have asserted the right themselves to define contraband. We have accordingly reached a condition where during the last war practically everything was held by Great Britain to be contraband. In support of that statement I simply wish to read a line from the communication from Charles F. Carusi, who is a very high authority upon international law:

> The traditional American policy respects the freedom of the seas and the rights of neutral shipping. It is not too much to say that the British prize law as developed during the Great War has definitely stripped the neutral of every possible right, and extended to the belligerent an unlimited discretion in laying hands of violence upon neutral shipping, bringing it into its own tribunals, and then condemning it for the benefit of the crown.

So that the question which is confronting us is whether we can do something to prevent war from spreading, whether we can remove that condition which is liable to draw into every great war a number of nations having no direct concern with the war. That was once manifested in history in the days of Catherine II when all commerce was being swept from the seas and she was obliged to form and did form a coalition known as "the armed neutrality," which insisted upon the rights of neutrals and backed it with the cannon of the ships of many nations.

I have as much desire to see the world at peace as the most ardent pacifist who ever lived. I have believed that the methods which have been sought to be employed were not the proper methods. I opposed the League of Nations because I believed it was setting up a power which would become or might become a menace to the United States. I do not believe, sir, in some foreign tribunal sitting down and saying what the United States shall do and what it shall not do. I am not going to discuss that question further than merely to advert to it as I have.

But I am willing that the United States shall sit down at the council table with a number of friendly nations in the time of peace and agree to something that will have a tendency to limit war to the nations that see fit to make war, so that the innocent bystander will not be disturbed in his rights. The best way to stop war is to remove the causes of war. The most fruitful cause of the spreading of war and the drawing in of other countries is interference with their commerce. That, indeed, is the thing which involved us in the great World War; that is the thing which sent our boys across the ocean—the interference with American shipping and the destruction of American lives upon the high seas.

Mr. President, if the amendment, which is couched in the most general terms, shall be adopted it will be an expression of opinion to the world that the American Congress favors treaties which will provide for the safety of innocent commerce of neutral nations while other nations see fit to make war. It will have a tendency to limit the scope of war. The first thing a good fireman does when he arrives at the scene of conflagration is to try to limit the fire to the particular building where it started. Sometimes in order to do that he destroys surrounding property. The best thing that can be done to produce peace in the world is to limit the effect and disaster of war to the nations that see fit to fight. If they want to fight, let them fight, but when they are fighting let us insist that they shall respect our rights. It is better to try to arrange that by treaty than it is to enforce those rights by the mouths of our cannon.

Mr. President, if we do not take this course, if we do not try by treaty to remove these causes of war, then I agree with my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] in his statement that there will be nothing left for us to do but to build our Navy so strong that we can enforce our rights and protect our interests against any navy of any country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I will reserve my time on the bill.

Mr. REED of Missouri subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as an addendum to my remarks this morning an article appearing in the National University Law Review entitled "The First Armed Neutrality." The article was written by Dr. Charles F. Carusi and Dr. Constantine D. Kojouharoff.

Doctor Carusi is also author of The Deans' Round Table, is dean of the National University Law School, and has been a large contributor to the learning on international law.

The other author is Dr. Constantine D. Kojouharoff, who is a graduate of the University of Sofia, from which he received the degree of master of law and political science. During the war he served as an officer in the army. He practiced law in Bulgaria in association with the late Bulgarian Minister of the Interior, Michael Takev. Doctor Kojouharoff was at one time editor in chief of the Napred, a Bulgarian daily, and the Near East American, a monthly periodical published in Washington, D. C. In 1925 he was awarded the degree of doctor of philosophy by the American University. He is the author of many essays and works, principally in the Bulgarian language, upon historical and political science topics. His Origins of the World War is now in process of publication in Bulgaria. For about 10 years Doctor Kojouharoff has been engaged in research work and is at present research professor of the National University School of Economics and Government.

In addition to having that article inserted in the RECORD, I ask permission also to have inserted in the RECORD as supplemental to it an article prepared by the two gentlemen to whom I have just referred, which, I believe, brings the information with reference to the whole question of right of neutrals upon the sea more nearly down to date than any other publication with which I am acquainted. I commend them to Senators interested in the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

[From National University Law Review, January, 1929]

THE FIRST ARMED NEUTRALITY

By Charles F. Carusi and Constantine D. Kojouharoff

The declaration of the first armed neutrality was the beginning of organized effort on the part of neutrals to assert their rights on the high seas and secure the freedom of navigation, which culminated in the declaration of Paris and the subsequent international agreements accepting the rights of neutrals as general principles of international law. At the same time the league formed by Catherine of Russia for the protection of neutral navigation played a decisive part in the outcome of the war for American independence. As we shall see, the tenacious efforts of England to draw the Russian Government into an offensive and defensive alliance at first split upon the rock of England's unwillingness to join in a casus foederis against Turkey, and then on Russia's unwillingness to be embroiled in a general war in order to assist England in the maintenance of her predominant naval position. Had such an alliance been consummated, it is a foregone conclusion that the American Colonies would not have achieved their independence. Thus the first armed neutrality presents interest from two points of view: First, in connection with the principle of the freedom of the seas; and secondly, in connection with the outcome of the war for American independence.

Prior to the declaration of the first armed neutrality, or, indeed, to the treaty of Paris, maritime warfare was waged along strictly piratical lines. In the course of the fourteenth century freebooters were converted into a sort of irregular militia, under the name of privateers, and subjected to the jurisdiction of admiralty courts. Down to the end of the sixteenth century neutral commerce had not yet attained any great proportions, and was left to the mercy of belligerents. The next period witnessed the establishment of regular navies, and the decrees of belligerents abrogating or modifying the customs of the Middle Ages. In the meantime neutral navigation increased and made necessary new principles of public law to secure the free intercourse of nations. Thus the question of reconciling the interests of belligerents and neutrals arose, but all efforts in that direction during the eighteenth century were in vain. At the close of the period the leading maritime powers of Europe adopted the principle of immunity of enemy cargo on board neutral ships. (Katchenowsky, pp. 1–13.) Nevertheless, while the main naval powers in treaties among themselves had accepted the principle of free navigation on the basis of reciprocity, the carrying trade being the main source of naval strength (this was absolutely true at the close of the eighteenth century, when merchant ships and warships were convertible), the European powers aspiring to rule the seas opposed the establishment of the freedom of navigation as a general rule of international law. The freedom of navigation and immunity of private property on the high seas are principles inconsistent with a monopoly in the carrying trade of the world, therefore in order to retain its superior position on the seas in time of war, the predominant naval power adopted as national policy a determined opposition to the rights of neutrals and the freedom of the seas. Such a policy subordinated the interests of the majority of European nations to the aspirations of a single nation for the maintenance of its naval preponderance and was bound to provoke resistance. The first organized effort of the European powers for the purpose of protecting the freedom of navigation against belligerents found its expression in the league formed by Russia in 1780, known as the first armed neutrality.

The substance of the declaration was as follows: (i) Neutral vessels may freely navigate from port to port and along the coasts of nations at war; (ii) the goods belonging to subjects of powers at war shall be free on board neutral vessels, with the exception of contraband merchandise; (iii) as to the specification of contraband the Empress held to what is expressed in the 10 and 12 articles of her treaty of commerce with Great Britain (see note No. 8. Articles 10–11 of this treaty were embodied in the British instructions to the commanders of warships and privateers of November 20, 1780 (Scott, p. 329)), extending its application to all powers at war; (iv) the designation of blockaded port shall apply only to a port where an attacking power has stationed its vessels sufficiently near and in such a way as to render access thereto clearly dangerous; (v) these principles shall serve as a rule of procedure and of judgment as to legality of process.

This declaration was promulgated on the 28th of February (March 11), 1780, and was addressed to England, France, and Spain and called the attention of those countries to the fact that "hindrance to the liberty of trade in general and to that of Russia in particular was of a nature to arouse the attention of all neutral nations; and that the Empress found herself obliged, therefore, to overcome it by means compatible with her dignity and the well-being of her subjects, but before putting these means into execution, and with a sincere intention of preventing any future infringements, she thought it just to publish to all Europe the principles which are the most proper to prevent any misunderstanding or occurrence which might occasion it. Her Imperial Majesty, in making these points public, does not hesitate to declare that to maintain them and to protect the honor of her flag, the security of the trade, and navigation of her subjects she is preparing a considerable part of her maritime forces. This measure will not, however, influence the strict neutrality she does observe and will observe so long as she is not provoked and forced to pass the bounds of moderation and perfect impartiality." (Scott, pp. 273, 274; Martens (1st ed. II, p. 74), (2d ed. III, p. 158); F. F. Martens, X, pp. 307–310; Piggott & Omond, pp. 198, 199; Morskoi Sbornik, pp. 336–338, Doc. XXII. The original dated February 27; on the margin Catherine's approval, "Bit po semou"; Obolensky, pp. 36, 37; cf. Wharton, III, p. 606 ff.)

The first armed neutrality was then a declaration of principles intended to secure the freedom of navigation and regard for the rights of neutrals, an attempt to substitute definite rules of conduct for the ill-defined pronouncement under which prize courts might serve as instruments of national policy rather than as tribunals of justice. Such an attempt must of necessity be repugnant to the nations aspiring to dominate the seas. Therefore, in the examination of the reception accorded to the first armed neutrality we shall find but little sympathy on the part of England for the formulas expressed in Catherine's declaration. Rather shall we meet with attempts on the part of English writers to discredit its motive and purpose, and we shall hear the claim that such principles are mere "undigested theories" (Piggott: Freedom of the Seas (London, 1920), p. 58 f), that the prize courts are administering the "law of nations" and may safely be trusted to do full justice to foreign shipping. (This doctrine of Lord Mansfield and Sir William Scott was reasserted by the Privy Council during the Great War in the Zamora case (1916), 2 A. C. 77, 90–94; for the British interpretation of this doctrine vide Colombos, The Law of Prize, London, 1926 (A. P. Higgins's introduction); for its soundness vide W. S. Holdsworth, History of English Law, I, p. 565 ff.)

The British contend that Catherine of Russia was friendly to England and in favor of an alliance with her, that the mobilization of the Russian fleet and the declaration were intended to assist England, but that Catherine's foreign minister, Count Panin, taking advantage of her ignorance of international law and the eventual effect of the steps as proposed by him, gained the upper hand in the court intrigue, and a declaration against England resulted. (For the evidence upon which the British contention is based see the bibliographical notes.) Under the circumstances, in order to ascertain the true motives and the results of the first armed neutrality in connection with both the freedom of navigation and American independence, and in order to establish the warranty of the British contention, we shall review Anglo-Russian relations during the whole period of the negotiations of the alliance; and we shall ascertain the international position of England and her attitude toward the principles laid down in the first armed neutrality.

I

As soon as Catherine II succeded to the Russian throne, every effort on the part of the English was made to renew the treaty of alliance of 1742 and the commercial treaty of 1734. The ambassador in Petersburg, Lord Buckingham, was instructed to insist upon the "naturally united" interests of the two countries. (Sbornik, XII, pp. 16, 59, 101, etc. (For Anglo-Russian relations before the accession of Catherine, see Vorontzov's Archiv, VII, p. 544; XXV, p. 272; Tchechoulin, p. 147 f.; Sbornik, XLVIII, p. 18; Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. V, p. 1399. The treaties of 1734 and 1766 (Martens, II, p. 141) with Russia, grant in general terms the most-favored-nation treatment, and the convention of March 25, 1793 (Martens, I, p. 108) merely prolongs the treaty of 1766 for six years, with few alterations. The convention, in case of war, of the same date (Martens, p. 114) promises mutual assistance during the war; cf. Sbornik, XII, pp. 16–24; 101 ff.; Sbornik, XLVIII, pp. 176, 550 f.) England was isolated, her relations with France were strained, and she could not count upon any of the continental powers. (Sbornik, XII, p. 71; cf. Oulianitzky, p. 208.)

Realizing this situation, Count Panin proposed a renewal of the alliance under the condition of a casus foederis against Turkey, concerted action in Poland, armed assistance in case of war, and exercise of joint influence in Sweden. (Sbornik, XII, pp. 111, 118, 154; Sbornik, XXII, p. 246; Oulianitzky, App. 40.) So far as Turkey and Poland were concerned, England found the Russian terms unacceptable, and the negotiations were postponed, until in 1765 the new English ambassador, Macartney, was charged to direct all his efforts toward the renewal of the commercial treaty alone. (Soloviev, XXVI, pp. 103, 107, 110 f, 113 f, 115 f, 120, 201; Sbornik, XII, pp. 114, 129 f, 140 f, 168, 184 f; Oulianitzky, p. 210; Tchetchoulin, p. 151 f; Tchtenia, 1865, II, p. 423 f.) Macartney took up the matter and, exceeding his instructions, signed a commercial treaty on August 4–15, 1765. The English Government refused ratification, unless some of the provisions be qualified by a declaration, and again the negotiations were deadlocked. (Sbornik, XII, pp. 209–210, 221; Oulianitzky, p. 211; Tchetchoulin, p. 154 f. For text of the treaty, vide F. F. Martens, X, p. 242 ff; for text of the provisions objectionable to the British Government, vide Sbornik, XXII, p. 433 ff. It is noteworthy that the Russian Government, considering the project of the treaty with England, expressed misgivings as to the eventual conduct of England on the seas in time of war "which might be oppressive to all neutrals." Sbornik, LVII, p. 289 ff.)

Influenced by her own interests, during the period of the Russo-Turkish crisis (1768–1774), England manifested open sympathies for the Russian cause. (At that time, the Russian trade was more important to England than the Levantine. At the same time, by supporting Russia against Turkey, England was undermining the position of the French in Constantinople, Ouliantizky, App. 15, 36, 37; Soloviev, XXVII, p. 222; Politique de tous les cabinets, I, p. 326 f, 333 f.) At this time Russia's position was more advantageous than that of England, and Panin was not less exacting than before; realizing that the Russian alliance was a necessity for England, he was determined to make use of her in his continental schemes. (Sbornik, XII, p. 232, 267–269, 285 (vide Nos. 136, 137, 157, 159, 160, 168, 172, 175, 179, 181, 182, etc.); Sbornik, XXII, p. 428 (vide Nos. 97, 101, 110, 153, etc.); Raumer, II, p. 62 f, 67 f, 96; Vorontzov's Archiv, VII, p. 629; Soloviev, XXVI, p. 202.)

The English attempted to capitalize their benevolent attitude toward Russia, but Count Panin held fast to his previous terms. (Sbornik, XII, pp. 286, 296 (vide Nos. 172, 180, 181).) In the summer of 1768 the new English ambassador, Cathcart, arrived in Petersburg, with instructions to ascertain the views of the Russian Government on the alliance. Russia was getting involved in Poland and Sweden, and the English began to consider the price of the Russian alliance high. (Sbornik, XII, pp. 333, 365; Tchetchoulin, p. 157.) Nevertheless, Cathcart renewed the negotiations, and in October, 1768, Count Panin handed to him a memorandum of the views of the Russian Government, renouncing the casus foederis against Turkey. (Sbornik, XII, pp. 371, 380, 404; Sbornik, XIX, p. 1; Sbornik, XXII, pp. 277, 426, 442; Raumer, II, p. 200.) Cathcart insisted that the proposal was acceptable, but London was of a different opinion and again nothing was accomplished. Thus the most favorable opportunity for the English to conclude the alliance was lost. (Sgornik, XII, pp. 415, 436, 442, 453, 463.)

In February, 1769, the English Government handed to the Russian ambassador, Tchernishev, a new project of alliance; the Turkish casus foederis was excluded; England reserved the right to substitute subsidies for armed assistance in case her security demanded her whole fleet. Cathcart was instructed to use all his efforts for the acceptance of the proposal. Count Panin turned down this proposal, stating that it was a waste of time to discuss proposals of no practical value. The negotiations were abandoned and renewed once more toward the end of 1770. (Sbornik, XII, p. 422; Soloviev, XXVIII, p. 97 f, 101.) In view of the war, the English, considering the moment opportune, made one more attempt to conclude the alliance. (Sbornik, XIX, p. 55 f, 141, 172 f; Oulianitzky, p. 233 ff.) Now, England agreed to furnish ships on any European sea. On September 19, 1770, Cathcart communicated it to Panin and again the proposal was found unacceptable. Now, Catherine was convinced that the English Government was lacking a firm foreign policy, and, furthermore, that England's position might involve Russia in a war. (Sbornik, XIX, pp. 132, 141, 157 f, 211, 227 f; Raumer, II, p. 327 f. (According to Cathcart's report, the proposal was received favorably; Sbornik, XIX, Nos. 42, 49, 54; Soloviev, XXVIII, p. 202 f. Soon, however, Cathcart discovered his mistake, when Count Panin refused the proposal under the pretext of the Turkish casus foederis being omitted; Oulianitzky, p. 238–239).)

The English attitude in connection with the operations of the Russian fleet against Turkey had in view the Russian alliance, encouragement to Russia in regard to her fleet, which eventually might be of assistance to England herself, and, finally, the damage the war in the Mediterranean was doing to the French trade in the east. (Sbornik, XII, pp. 459, 468; Sbornik, XIX, p. 42; Soloviev, XXVIII, p. 103.) The English were in need of the Russian alliance, but were trying to secure it at their own terms. (Sbornik, XII, p. 284; Soloviev, XXVI, pp. 115–117, 120; Tchetchoulin, p. 159.) The fact was that England had lost her prestige and was not in a position to play an important part on the continent. (Oulianitzky, p. 280; Beer, Documents, pp. 6, 11; Beer, Zusammenkünfte, p. 71. England was in a very bad position; constant conflicts between the Crown and Parliament, frequent change of cabinets, hunger in India, and, above all, disorders in the American Colonies. Sbornik, XIX, p. 209 ff; Sbornik, LXXXVII, p. 299 f. 349 ff; Sbornik, LXVI, p. 287.)

Cathcart's efforts failed, and, in order to force Russia into the alliance, the English discontinued the Swedish subsidies. Count Panin stated that in such a case there could be no question of Anglo-Russian cooperation. (Sbornik, XIX, Nos. 66, 67, 68, 73; Tchetchoulin, p. 160 f.) Cathcart continued to insist upon the alliance, while Panin put the matter off by stating that a treaty was the formal part of the Anglo-Russian friendship and that even without its existence Russia would not fail to give proof of her friendly sentiments. (Sbornik, XIX, p. 209 f.) Finally, after the nogtiations had lasted from September, 1770, to June, 1771, Cathcart realized that the Russian Government treated the alliance as a matter of secondary importance and requested his recall. (Sbornik, XIX, pp. 218 f, 223; Oulianitzky, pp. 240–242. (The English counted mainly on the assistance given Russia in the Archipelago expedition by preventing French intervention aimed to frustrate the appearance of the Russian fleet in the Mediterranean and its operations against Turkey. On the intentions of France, see: Politique de tous les cabinets, II, pp. 43, 46; Boutaric, II, p. 176; Peysonnell, Examen de livre, etc., p. 10; on England's attitude, see: Eton, tableau historique de l'empire Ottoman, II, p. 166; Vassif-efendi, précis historique de la guerre de 1769–1774, p. 86 f; Politique de tous le cabinets, I, 323; II, p. 44; Sbornik, XIX, pp. 61, 107, 121, 127).)

Frederick of Prussia was opposing England's participation in the northern system. (Sbornik, XX, p. 156; Raumer, I, p. 43; II, pp. 89 f, 134, 200.) Petersburg reflected Frederick's views as to the alliance. (Sbornik, XIX, Nos. 82, 98; Raumer, II, pp. 200, 231–232, 236.) Anglo-Russian relation cooled off (Sbornik, XIX, p. 265 f; Oulianitzky, pp. 282–283) to such an extent that the negotiations of the partition of Poland were kept secret from England. (Sbornik, XIX, pp. 163, 224, 249, 259, 261, 265, 268–269, 272, 280, 282, 290–291, 305, 312, 336–337, etc.; Raumer, II, p. 569; Soloviev, XXVIII, p. 364.) Distrustful of England's intentions with respect to her freedom of navigation in the Black Sea, Russia accepted the mediation of Austria and Prussia. (Sbornik, XII, Nos. 212, 215, 219, 225, etc.; Sbornik, XIX, pp. 39, 81 f, 113, 186, 132; Raumer, II, p. 283; Soloviev, XXVIII, p. 204 f; Archiv. Gosoudarstvenavo Sovieta, I, pp. 34–40, 58. Catherine turned down the English mediation mainly because she mistrusted their intentions in connection with Russia's aims for freedom of navigation in the Black Sea (Oulianitzky, p. 290; Sbornik, XLX, p. 4; Soloviev, XXVIII, pp. 100–103). In the fall of 1770 when England proposed to guarantee the Russo-Turkish treaty, the navigation of the Black Sea was included (Archiv. Gos. Sovieta, I, p. 58; Raumer, II, p. 283). In London the Russian mistrust of England was realized and Gunning was instructed "to remove any impressions on the minds of the Empress and her ministers, with respect to jealousies entertained by us of any territorial or maritime acquisitions she may make on the Black Sea, exclusive of a passage for Russian ships from that sea to the Mediterranean" (Sbornik, XIX, p. 265 f).)

In the meantime the growing complications between Russia and Sweden made England adopt a waiting attitude. (Soloviev, XXVIII, p. 415; Sbornik, XIX, pp. 331–332; Raumer, II, pp. 566–568; Tchetchoulin, p. 162 ff. For some time the French were preparing to intervene in case of war between Russia and Sweden; the English tried to avoid the outbreak and threatened France, stating that if France intervened, England would have to support Russia, Raumer, II, 570, 575–576.) As a matter of fact, in 1773 the position of Russia became so complicated that the Russian Government took the initiative in reopening the negotiations with England. (Sbornik, XIX, pp. 348 f, 359 f, 378, etc.; Archiv. Gos. Sovieta, I, p. 386.) Once more the English insisted upon their own terms. (Sbornik, XIX, pp. 360 f, 366, 374, etc.) Under the circumstances Panin was not inclined to conclude the alliance "since Russia obtained all the assistance England could afford, anyway." (Sbornik, XIX, pp. 365, 375; Oulianitzky, p. 304. (The conclusion of the English that Panin's Prussian sympathies were the cause of the failure is an exaggeration. Russia was taking advantage of the attitude of England without assuming any obligations; the latter's position and interests forced this attitude upon her, Sbornik, XIX, Nos. 160, 177, 179, 184, 192.) English public opinion, on account of commercial interests, was also favorable to Russia, Polit. de tous les cab. I, pp. 310 f, 326 f.)

Thus while the Russo-Turkish War lasted (1774) the Russian Government made the English believe in the possibility of the conclusion of an alliance, Catherine herself assisting in the maintenance of this impression. After 1774, when the war with Turkey was over, and the rebellion of the American Colonies manifested the impotence of England and complicated her internal and international position, Catherine abandoned the idea of the alliance. Moreover, the persistence of the English to play the rôle of mediator between Russia and Turkey had convinced the Empress that the English would oppose Russia's access to the Mediterranean. (F. F. Martens, X, pp. 284–285. Upon several occasions Mousin-Pouschkin advocated the English mediation, and Panin repeatedly refused. The conclusion of the K-Kainardji treaty came in London as an unpleasant surprise and, according to the report of Mousin-Pouschkin, made a strong impression, ibid., X, pp. 286–287.)

While the revolt of the American Colonies was coming to a head England was endeavoring to obtain Russian assistance. (Bancroft (1834), VIII, p. 147 f; Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, p. 1083. From London Mousin-Pouschkin reported that England not only was not in a position to oppose Russian interests in the East but was seeking Russian help, since France and Spain were expected to intervene, therefore this is the explanation of England's declining the request of the Porte of English mediation for the revisions of the K-Kainardji treaty.) In a private and confidential dispatch dated June 30, 1775, Suffolk wrote to Gunning in connection with the rebellion of the American Colonies, instructing him that he endeavor to learn whether His Majesty might rely upon the Empress of Russia to furnish him with any considerable corps of her infantry for use in America. He added that this commission was of "the most delicate nature," and therefore should be executed "inaffectedly," so as to give it "the air of an idle speculation of private character and by no means that of a proposal." (Sbornik, XIX, pp. 463, 464, No. 251; Cf. Bancroft, VIII, p. 148 ff.)

Gunning carried out his instructions and reported (August 8, 1775) that he should have preferred directly discussing the alliance with the Empress, but that he had been unable to see her, and had discussed the matter with Panin. Gunning had asked, if in consequence of the Empress's frequent assurances he might confirm to the King that he might reckon on a body of Her Majesty's infantry. The Empress ordered Panin to give Gunning the strongest assurances, expressing her readiness to give His Majesty every assistance he should desire, thus having an occasion of testifying her gratitude for the important services she had received. (Sbornik, XIX, pp. 471, 472, 473, 474, No. 256; Cf. Bancroft, VIII, p. 151 f. In the meanwhile, on September 10, Gunning held a conversation with the Empress which was limited to generalities and which the British minister interpreted as a confirmation "in the strongest manner" of the assurances given him by Panin. The Empress asked him how matters stood in America, stating her wishes that the matter be ended as soon as possible, Sbornik, XIX, p. 488, No. 262.)

On September 1, 1775, Suffolk instructed Gunning to ask for an audience with Her Imperial Majesty and deliver a letter, in which the assistance of 20,000 desciplined infantry, completely equipped, were asked of the Empress. They were to be ready to embark in the spring and sail to Canada under the command of the British commander in chief. (Sbornik, XIX, p. 477, No. 257; cf. Bancroft, VIII, p. 148 f.)

Next, on the 8th of September, 1775, Suffolk sent a most confidential dispatch concerning the project of a treaty. He let much to Gunning's discretion, stating that "the substance is of much more consequence than the form." Suffolk expected that Gunning had taken particular care to have it understood that succours were wanted in America. "If there is any misunderstanding, the measure is demolished as, it is in America alone that assistance can be of any use." (Sbornik, XIX, pp. 480, 481, 482; cf. Bancroft, VIII, p. 148 ff. The project of the treaty did not specify the number of troops; it was left for an agreement between the Russian Government and Gunning. The English transports were to arrive on March 25, 1776, the troops were to be transported to "His Britannic Majesty's North American Colonies." From March 25 the troops would be placed in the pay of His Britannic Majesty, and would be paid and maintained on equal footing with those of Britain. The project mentioned that the regiments which had suffered losses would be brought up to their full number by new recruiting done at the expense of His Britannic Majesty. The troops were to be retained ad employed in the American Colonies according to the circumstances. The term of the treaty was two years from the date of signature; negotiations for renewal to be reopened three months before the expiration of its terms. An additional article proposed to pay the Empress of Russia 7 pounds sterling for each recruit, one-half the amount being paid upon ratification, and the other half at the time of the departure, Sbornik, XIX, pp. 483–487, Nos. 260–261 (British F. O., Sir Robert Gunning, 1775, No. 115).)

In his letter to the Empress, mentioning the frequent assurances of firm friendship made by her, the King of England wrote that he was most sincerely grateful for the noble declarations made to Gunning, and that he "accepts the assistance proposed" by her—Russian troops which might prove necessary on account of the rebellious acts of his American Colonies. He added that his minister would be furnished full powers to negotiate the details. (Sbornik, XIX, pp. 478–479, No. 258 (Sept. 1, 1775); Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, 1083.)

The request of England was marked by so much extravagance that nothing but the wildest credulity of statesmanship could have anticipated success. On October 1 Gunning reported the results of his efforts. Panin had stated that the Empress showed much repugnance to having troops employed in America, and to such a large number, but said that she would be glad to assist England in any other way than by sending troops out of Europe. Gunning proposed a corps of 15,000 men. Panin informed the English minister that the Empress had not yet come to a decision. Gunning, however, was unable to obtain an answer from the Empress on account of a sudden indisposition of hers. (Sbornik, XIX, pp. 490, 497, No. 265; cf. Bancroft, VIII, p. 152 ff.)

On October 7, 1775, Gunning reported that Panin had told him that the Empress had taken her resolution and it was impossible to make any favorable impression on her. The Empress sent a letter to be delivered to His Majesty, the contents of which were found to correspond very little to Gunning's interpretation of the assurances of the Russian Government. Gunning tried to induce Panin to make another effort to obtain a more favorable answer, but the latter replied that it would be ineffectual, and at the same time gave a "most solemn assurance" that no idea of a change of system was contemplated by the Empress. (Sbornik, XIX, pp. 498, 499, No. 264; see No. 266. (The letter seemed to the British envoy in some passages exceptionable, and he was in doubt whether it was fit to be received; but, suppressing his discontent, he forwarded it to his sovereign, Bancroft, VIII, p. 155 f.).)

In her letter to the King, reassuring him of her sentiments, Catherine stated that he could count on her good will and readiness to be useful to him independent of formal obligation. So far as the demand for 20,000 troops was concerned, she stated that such a number of troops and the place to be employed were beyond the means at her disposal; that her Empire needed peace, and that after the prolonged war the army was in a disorganized condition; the destination was to another continent and the troops would lose contact with the country; furthermore, that Swedish and Polish affairs were by no means in a settled state, and that the dignity of both Empires would be affected if they joined forces against a rebellion not supported by other foreign powers; the latter might even intervene because of the participation of Russian troops. In fine, Catherine declined the demand. (Sbornik, XIX, pp. 500–502, No. 265, September 23, 1775; Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, pp. 1083–1094.) In London the impression was that "The letter of the Empress is a clear refusal and not in so genteel a manner as I should have thought might have been expected from her; she had not had the civility to answer in her own hand and has thrown out some expressions that may be civil to a Russian ear but certainly not to more civilized ones." (Fortescue: The correspondence of King George III, Vol. III, pp. 275–276, No. 1737, Lord North to the King; Donne, George III, Correspondence with Lord North, Vol. I, p. 282.) Gunning was of the opinion that the Empress's decision was contrary to Panin's advice and that the King of Prussia had nothing to do with it; Sbornik, XIX, No. 268. In the meantime, on October 20, the Russian representative in London, Lizakevitch, reported that the English newspapers were full of reports that Russian troops were to be used in America; this was done with such persistence, Lizakevitch wrote, that all foreign representatives believed it. (Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, 1084.)

The failure of the English to obtain Russian assistance against the American Colonies did not put an end to their efforts to conclude an alliance. The difficulties between Russia and Turkey in connection with the treaty of Kutchouk-Kainardji and the possibility of a renewal of the conflict kept the hopes of the British alive. (According to the French representative in Petersburg (December, 1776), even before the arrival of Sir James Harris, the English had renewed their demands for assistance; Mr. Oakes had visited Panin and demanded Russian assistance in case England found herself involved in a war with France and Spain. Knowing that Catherine refused to assist England against the American Colonies, Vergennes was convinced that Russia would not enter a war against France and Spain for English interests; Fauchille: p. 10–11. It appears that at the same time Lord North attempted to achieve the alliance through the influence of Prince Orlof. The latter was pleased "with the confidence shown him," and promised to do his best; Fortescue, III, p. 278, No. 1741, Lord North to the King.) With this purpose in view, Sir James Harris (afterwards first Earl of Malmesbury), one of the ablest English diplomats, was appointed English minister in Petersburg. (F. F. Martens, X, pp. 289–290; Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, 1150, Harris, I, p. XI; Goertz, p. 15 ff.)

Upon his departure for Petersburg, Harris was not formally charged to renew the negotiations with the Russian Government. But after France became connected with the United States, England, though aware of the disinclination of Russia and of Frederick, was so anxious to counterbalance the family compact of the Bourbons (Suffolk to Harris, January 9, 1778. Part of the dispatch was omitted from the Malmesbury Papers, vide Bancroft, X, p. 256) that it risked the proposal of an offensive and defensive alliance with them both. As early as January 9, 1778, Lord Suffolk wrote that since Russia had taken no initiative in the matter and that on account of the success of the American Colonies it was necessary to ascertain the sentiments of the Russian court in regard to an offensive and defensive alliance. (Harris, I, pp. 157–160.) Count Panin, the only statesman listened to by the Empress in the discussion of foreign affairs, "was beyond the reach of corruption, and in all transactions where he moved alone acted with integrity and honor." To the renewed overture of Harris he frankly replied that "Russia never would stipulate advantages to Great Britain in its contest with its colonies" and "never would guarantee its American dominions." (Harris to Suffolk, February 13, 1778; omitted from the Malmesbury Papers, vide Bancroft, X, p. 257; Cf. Harris, I, pp. 162–163. For Panin, see Tourgenev, p. 241 ff.)

The position of Russia was clear; nevertheless Harris missed no opportunity to insist upon the alliance. He realized that the task was difficult and wrote home to assure them of this. (Harris, I, p. 175–176.) In fulfillment of his instructions, Harris handed to Panin a memorandum arguing in favor of the alliance. He stated that Russia had often felt French jealousy; that in order to deprive England of a natural and strong ally the French were pressing the Turks to break the peace; that the time had come for London and Petersburg to join, and in case France attempted intervention in Germany the northern system, headed by Russia, would dictate to Europe; Russia would play the leading part, and that the foundation of this system was to be found in an Anglo-Russian alliance. (Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, 1150. For the conversations between Harris and Panin on the subject of the northern system see Harris, I, pp. 167–171.)

It appears that the English did not appreciate their own position. The project of the alliance proposed by Harris was nothing more than a revival of the old projects, the Turkish casus foederis being excluded. Moreover, an additional demand was made for the assistance of the Russian fleet. (Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, 1150; F. F. Martens, X, p. 290; Harris, I, p. 193.) In other words, Russia was requested to expose herself to a Turkish attack, England not only assuming no obligation to assist her against Turkey, but left free to counteract Russian interests in the East. Catherine ordered that the proposal be declined on the grounds of the Turkish casus foederis being excluded, and that the relations with Turkey being strained, Russia could not ignore her and assume obligations to assist England against her enemies; that the most insignificant conflict in America would mean a European war, bringing into play treaty obligations. (Soloviev, Bk. VI, 1150–1151; F. F. Martens, X, p. 291. Harris wrote home that there was no hope of success "as the Empress and her ministers are prejudiced against the English" (Diaries, I, p. 176). In the meantime Mousin-Pouschkin was reporting the desperate situation England was in, and her losses in trade and shipping (F. F. Martens, X, p. 290).)

England's position grew worse—her troops in America suffered reverses and her enemies increased in number. It became clear to Catherine and her ministers that Russia should under no circumstances assume obligations toward England. Nevertheless, England was badly in need of help and Harris began approaching Catherine herself, but obtained only "civil answers." Noticing at the same time some improvement in the position of the French, Harris wrote that the most to be obtained was to prevent Catherine from doing harm rather than giving help; that no matter what proposals were made Catherine was not disposed to agree, and that her attitude was made even clearer by the conduct of her ministers. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 291–292; Harris, I, p. 186–187, 191–193, 195–196.)

Harris saw clearly that it was "all words and no deeds, empty professions and shuffling evasions." (Harris, I, p. 199; Cf. Fauchille, p. 284 f.) Therefore Harris determined to achieve his task by means of corruption and by mixing in the intrigues of Catherine's court. And even then he wrote home that "the expense" of his mission would be "greatly beyond the services the King would ever reap from it." Unable to win Panin in such a manner, Harris had no choice but to persuade himself that Catherine's favorite, Prince Potemkin, was the person both inclined toward such deals and in a position to influence the Empress in favor of the alliance. (Harris, I, p. 191; F. F. Martens, X, p. 191–192. Only a few months earlier Harris wrote that Count Panin alone had the Empress' ear in the sphere of foreign affairs (Diaries, I, p. 164), and that Count Panin himself had stated that the Empress followed her own advice, and a policy calculated to serve Russian interests above all (ibid, I, 171). Thus it seems that Harris was well acquainted with the situation in Petersburg. Yet his aggressive nature influenced him to undermine his own position and to complete the failure of his mission. Prince Potemkin was unable to influence Catherine in connection with foreign affairs (cf. Fauchille, p. 245), he himself confessed to Harris this fact repeatedly (Harris, I, passim). Panin was antagonized by Harris's intrigues, calculated to undermine his position as Minister of Foreign Affairs; and Catherine was aware of Harris's methods and lost her confidence in him. Goertz characterized his conduct in the following manner: "Harris is an excellent example of what a dangerous thing it may prove for a man to rely too much on the force and superiority of his own genius, to give himself up to intrigue and to trust too much on appearances; and how difficult it is to carry his point when he finds himself opposed by the whole ministry" (Goertz, p. 13 f). For Catherine's opinion of Harris and her knowledge of his methods, vide: Sbornik, XXIII, p. 431 (Le chevalier Harris avait plus d'espirit que le marquis de Verac, qui n'en a point du tout; mais Harris est un Brouillon et un intrigant, et puis c'est tout"). Samoilox, Jizn i Deiatelnost General-Feldmarchala Kniazia Grigoria Aleksandrovitcha Potemkin-Tavritcheskavo, in Rousskii Archiv, 1867.)

Toward the end of July, 1779, through Potemkin, Harris secured an interview with Catherine in which he urged Russia's intervention in the war in order that an advantageous peace for England could be secured. Catherine replied: "What right have I, after all, to interfere in a quarrel foreign to my own concerns, on a subject I am not supposed to understand, and with courts at such a distance from me?" After Harris used all his arguments, Catherine confirmed to him that "powerful objections" still remained. (Harris, I, p. 252–3; F. F. Martens, X, p. 292; Fauchille, p. 288 ff.) It was clear that for the Russian Government an alliance with England was out of the question. Nevertheless, toward the end of November Harris handed to Panin a proposal for a defensive alliance, for the first time the Turkish casus foederis being included in the project. Harris stated that the conduct of England's enemies showed that there was no hope for peace; that all their steps manifest vast designs which should attract the attention of every sovereign who desired to retain his independence; that it now appeared doubtful whether England would be in a position to resist them successfully without allies; that the Empress alone was in a position to impose her will on them; if she found the means to achieve peace for England, then the latter would place her interests in the Empress' hands; if the enemy refused, then the Empress should assume a more decisive tone and, making use of her power, stop the war which threatened European liberty. In conclusion, Harris stated that he was authorized to sign a treaty of alliance in accordance with the inclosed project. Realizing that the project offered to Russia nothing except involving her in a European war, Harris added that England was the first to profit by such a treaty, but that Russia would profit later on. (Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, 1171; F. F. Martens, X, p. 292–3.)

Under the circumstances, there remained no doubt as to what the reply would be—the proposal was declined. Panin replied that the Empress was convinced that the measures proposed by the court of London instead of hastening the peace would produce a contrary effect. So far as the treaty of alliance was concerned the reply stated that the Empress felt sure that it would not escape the justice of the King; that the conclusion of a defensive alliance for the present war was impossible; and that its cause, not appertaining to their European possessions, had always been excluded from the Anglo-Russian treaties of alliance. (Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, 1171; F. F. Martens, X, p. 293; Bancroft-Circourt, III, p. 229 ff.)

Catherine's decision to remain neutral and assume no obligations toward England and the whole policy of the Empress during the time of the armed neutrality were clearly confirmed in the instructions given to Simolin upon his appointment in London (July, 1779). His instructions were that an alliance was out of the question. He was reminded that for some time Russia was under obligations to France for the latter's good offices in Constantinople in connection with the final settlement of the disagreements between the Russian Government and the Porte upon the K-Kainardji treaty; that Russia was under obligation to France for her cooperation in the settlement of the Bavarian question; and that in this manner France had achieved a rapprochement which was both welcome and useful to Russia. Therefore, without disturbing the friendly relations with England, whose interests were advantageous, Simolin was expected to show not even the slightest partiality toward England to the prejudice of France; he was to limit himself in the expression of hopes for the reestablishment of the peace. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 294–5; Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, 1170; Doniol, III, p. 733. It is noteworthy that similar instructions were also sent to the Russian minister in Paris, who communicated them to Vergennes, a copy of which the latter sent to the French minister in Madrid. (Doniol, III, p. 777 ff.) Thus the French Foreign Minister was well informed as to Russia's attitude. According to Harris himself (Diaries, I, p. 262), Simolin was a Potemkin man. His conduct in London, however, was by no means in the sense of the friendship Potemkin professed for England. As a matter of fact, Catherine's ambition was to act as mediator in the restoration of peace. Panin confided this to the French representative, and used the English proposals as an argument to induce the French to accept Russian mediation. (Fauchille, p. 310.) Vergennes appreciated the significance of the offer and accepted the Russian mediation. His acceptance was communicated to Panin after the Spanish seizure of Russian ships, and was met with great satisfaction (ibid, p. 312 f.). This greatly influenced Catherine's attitude in the Spanish incident, especially as Vergennes had won Florida-Blanca's agreement to the Russian mediation. (Ibid, p. 317.))

The commercial treaties specifying the goods considered contraband of war, were not of a nature to secure the rights of neutral navigation; subject to arbitrary interpretation and, lacking the support of armed force, these treaties were violated by the sea powers at every favorable opportunity. On account of this state of affairs, international commerce, the welfare of neutral nations, and the revenues of neutral governments suffered greatly. Especially oppressive was this state of affairs during the war of American Independence, in which the greatest maritime powers, England, France, and Spain, took part; their privateers appeared on all seas and, under all kinds of pretexts, plundered neutral shipping. (Obolensky, p. 30.) In this practice, as the strongest maritime power, England occupied the first place and, as Professor Martens affirms, it was England who furnished the cause for the formation of a league of the neutral powers. The endless abuses of neutral shipping and trade by the English privateers forced Catherine to seek means for checking the English practice. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 297–298. The diplomatic correspondence exchanged between Petersburg and London during the period 1778–1780, abounds in energetic complaints on the part of the Russian Government against the manner of action of English privateers and the decisions of the English Court of Admiralty. The Russian minister in London, Mousin-Pouschkin, constantly reported "the acts of brigandage" and "the impudent conduct" of the English privateers. On September 26–October 7, 1778, he wrote that all the London news consisted only in daily prizes, that "the greed with which enterprising merchants satisfy their desire for gain is actually the main benefit of the present English war, French commerce being ruined because the Government of France pays not enough attention to it." (F. F. Martens, X, p. 298.) The Prussians, Danish, Swedish, Dutch, Portuguese, and Venetian representatives in London complained constantly to the British Government of the numerous excesses committed by English privateers and demanded compensation for the losses of their subjects. The English ministers employed a very simple method—they did not receive the foreign representatives for months and thus avoided disagreeable explanations. On November 28–December 8, 1778, Mousin-Pouschkin wrote that the impudence of the English privateers was such that they threw themselves on every ship they met when Europe was still at peace, without informing the ships of the other nations of the outbreak of war between England and France, and disregarding the flags of all nations. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 299.)

In 1778, while Harris was making all efforts to involve Russia in the war, Panin remitted to him a note complaining that, after the London Cabinet was supposed to have issued strict instructions to their fleets, after the diplomatic representations of the Russian Government on account of the numerous complaints from Russian subjects whose lawful navigation was constantly interfered with by English ships, the Russian Government hoped that the practice would be abandoned permanently. These hopes, continued the note, were not fulfilled. The Russian merchantman St. Peter, on its way to Santo Domingo, had been seized by English privateers, in spite of the fact that it did not carry contraband of war and did not attempt to violate the blockade. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 298; Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, 1151. The owner petitioned Catherine, and the Russian minister at London was instructed to demand the release of the ship and her cargo, and the payment of compensation for the loss.)

Considerably before the incident of the Spanish privateers it began to appear to be necessary to take steps for the protection of neutrals on the high seas. Even American privateers appeared in the North Sea in 1778, damaged the foreign trade of Archangel, and caused Catherine to open negotiations with Sweden and Denmark for defense of neutral commerce in the North Sea (Obolensky, p. 31. According to Obolensky, the archives of the Russian ministry for foreign affairs show that the idea of the armed neutrality came up for the first time in the seventies, previous to the capture of Russian ships by Spanish privateers, and the capture of foreign ships headed for Russian ports), and to express her intention of sending her fleet to the Sound to protect her commerce and navigation in that sea. (Morskoi Sbornik, p. 43–52, Doc. I (Count Panin to Sacken in Copenhagen, August 17–28, 1778); Docs. II (Sacken to Count Panin, September 18–29; Bernstorff to Sacken, September 28; Bernstorff to Sacken, September 29, 1778; Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, 1172.)

Baron Nolcken, Swedish representative in Petersburg, expressed the desire of Sweden to have the protection extended to other seas as well, as they had suffered even more from depredations elsewhere. He was instructed to reach an agreement upon a declaration to be made to the belligerents. Gustav III proposed a treaty to that end and participation in common steps to be taken at London. (Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, 1172–1173.)

Panin was at this time favorable to limiting the cooperation with Sweden and Denmark to the North Sea for the safeguarding of foreign ships headed for Archangel. Panin's views were approved by Catherine. (Obolensky, pp. 31–32; Morskoi Sbornik, pp. 52–56, Doc. III (Panin to Catherine, 20/31 December, 1778); Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, 1173. (The Swedish proposal had been communicated also to Denmark. Bernstorff informed Petersburg that he desired to act in concert with Russia. Nevertheless he approved of the Swedish proposal, stating that under the existing conditions such a treaty would be of great benefit by securing neutral trade completely.) Cf. Fauchille, p. 250 ff. Vergennes was attempting to embroil Russia with England through a league of the neutrals; this was the cause of Panin's caution.) Russia made counterproposals to this effect. (Soloviev, (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, 1173; Obolensky, pp. 32–33; Morskoi Sbornik, pp. 57–59 (Panin to D'Ahlefeld, 2/13 February, 1779; Panin to Tchekalevsky and Ruckmann, 16/27 April, 1779); Cf. Fauchille, p. 255 ff.) Bernstorff replied for Denmark that he was ready to participate in the mutual protection of their merchant ships, but that it would be incompatible with strict neutrality to protect foreign ships in the North Sea. As Russian trade was carried chiefly in foreign bottoms it was recognized that his scruples would preclude any real protection to Russia's commerce. (Obolensky, p. 33; Morskoi Sbornik, pp. 59–63 (Docs. V, VI, VII, VIII, Tchekalevsky to Panin, January 5–16, January 26–February 6, March 2–13, April 6–17, 1779). Cf. Fauchille, p. 262.) In view of Catherine's plan Bernstorff proposed a convention on the subject. Russia, however, was not ready to assume formal obligations that might lead her into war in defense of foreign interests (Obolensky, p. 33; Morskoi Sbornik, pp. 63–66; Doc. IX (Bernstorff's letter of 19 March, 1779, communicated to Panin by D'Ahlefeld), and therefore decided to notify London that in the spring of 1779 a Russian squadron would cruise in the North Sea and stop all privateers. This measure she would take in accord with Sweden and Denmark, and England was invited to take steps insuring that her privateers should not appear in the North Sea, "which is preserved exclusively for the trade of the three powers." (F. F. Martens, X, p. 299 (Panin to Harris 8/19 January, 1779).)

In the meantime the war continued and complaints against the suppression of trade became more numerous and pressing. (Obolensky, p. 34; Morskoi Sbornik, pp. 75–80, Doc. XIV (Ruckmann to Panin, August 9–20, 1779); Doc. XV (Lord Weymouth to Baron Nolcken, 17 July, 1779); Doc. XVI (Panin to Harris, 6 November, 1779).) The London cabinet was forced to take some measures. It accordingly warned all English privateers by royal decree of 9/20 June, 1779, of the cruise of the Russian squadron, and ordered them to respect the rights of these neutral powers "as far as the nature of the maritime warfare permitted" and in any case not to attack enemy ships "in the ports and bays of any power with whom England is at peace." (F. F. Martens, X, p. 300; Cf. Fauchille, p. 269 ff.) In March Panin had protested against the seizure of a Russian ship at Viborg, and in November, 1779, the unlawful seizure of a Russian ship from Riga contrary to the treaty of 1776 and the law of nations. Harris gave assurances that Russian ships would neither be stopped nor searched, but English privateers, openly encouraged by their Government, continued their former practices. (F. F. Martenz, X, p. 300; Harris, I, 232, 308.) Claims for the release of the Russian ships and compensation for losses were left unsatisfied, and Catherine was displeased at the arbitrary manner and unlawful pretexts under which England seized and confiscated Danish ships. Simolin's report for 1779 bears witness to the failure of his efforts to support the Danish claims. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 301.)

When a break between England and Holland became imminent, fearing that the freedom of trade would be exposed to further limitations, Catherine proposed Russian mediation to the London cabinet. England declined a settlement with Holland, and Catherine wrote to Simolin that "the freedom of navigation and commerce was the only cause of England's war on Holland," and that "the rule of English policy was to treat as enemies all nations who, possessing a considerable fleet, propose to employ it in the transportation of what England, so despotically and on a grand scale, considers as contraband of war." (F. F. Martens, X, p. 301.)

Catherine wrote further that the adoption of such a rule was of a nature not to inspire confidence, amity, and good will, and that it was capable of irritating and embittering all neutral powers to the highest degree. Such was Catherine's state of mind, and English practice was the cause of her decision to act; moreover, the readiness of all neutral powers to oppose England by concerted action being self-evident. (F. F. Martens, X, pp. 301–302. In May Catherine's sympathies were completely on the side of France. Fauchille, p. 273.)

II

Catherine had made up her mind as to the policy she should follow. Her desire to pay the part of mediator and the attitude of France concerning both the mediation and the freedom of navigation made her incline toward a policy against England. The English practices on the seas confirmed her in this direction. The previous discussions of the question of freedom of navigation, and Bernstorff's proposal (Morskoi Sbornik, pp. 46–51 (Bernstorff to Sacken); Doniol, IV, p. 508) offered an expedient, and now the Spanish incident and the English treatment of the Dutch offered a convenient opportunity to act. Catherine determined to make use of it. Harris attempted to influence Catherine in her attitude toward Spain, but his efforts came too late. The same day, when he was arranging the matter with Potemkin (January 19–30, 1780), Catherine had already consulted Panin and made her decision upon the note to be dispatched to Madrid. (Fauchille, p. 317 f; Morskoi Sbornik, No. XVIII. Being instructed to press the idea of an alliance through Potemkin, but knowing that the "proposal of an alliance would be rejected," Harris suggested that Catherine make a strong declaration at Versailles and Madrid and reinforce this declaration by preparation of her naval forces (Harris, I, p. 245 ff) (Harris to Weymouth, September 9–20, 1779); F. F. Martens, pp. 302–303; Fauchille, p. 287 f. But this was done in July, 1779—eight months previous to the declaration. Catherine adopted the expedient of a declaration, and communicated it to the belligerents, not because Harris gave her the idea but because she desired to play the leading part. That is why the declaration was addressed to the belligerents previous to the negotiations with the neutral powers. Harris told her such an act would make her outshine Peter the Great. Having in view her mediation, Catherine again advised peace with the American Colonies (Harris, I, p. 252 ff). That her platonic assurances of friendship meant and were intended to mean only civilities is shown by the fact that she repeated them when her declaration of the armed neutrality directed against England was ready (F. F. Martens, X, pp. 303–304).)

In January, 1780, the Russian Government was informed that Spanish privateers had captured two ships with Russian cargoes—a Dutch ship carrying grain from Archangel and a Russian ship. Both ships were captured on the pretext that they headed for Gibraltar. The ships were taken to Cadiz, and the cargoes sold at auction. (Obolensky, pp. 34–35; F. F. Martens, X, p. 304. Catherine's mind as to the armed neutrality was made up previously to the incident. The Spanish treatment of the Russian ships disturbed Corberon, and he visited Panin for an explanation of the subject. Corberon found the Russian minister calm, treating the incident as a "misunderstanding," and declaring that the Empress had the intention of seeking the good offices of France in order to prevent such "inconveniences" in the future. Fauchille, p. 312 f.) In the two notes handed to the Spanish minister in Petersburg, Normandes (Morskoi Sbornik, p. 80 ff, Docs. XVII and XX; Goertz, p. 26), and in Catherine's rescript to the Russian minister in Madrid, Zinoviev (Morskoi Sbornik, pp. 83–88, Doc. XVIII. The note to Spain referred to neutral shipping in general and was the beginning of the armed neutrality. Zinoviev was instructed to exchange confidences, above all, with the representative of Denmark, knowing their attitude. In the meantime, at The Hague, Galitzin was occupied in arranging an alliance with the Netherlands for the protection of maritime commerce. Fauchille, p. 319), the Russian demands were: (1) All neutral ships taken to Cadiz and other ports on board of which Russian merchandise be found be released immediately and allowed to proceed on their voyage to their destinations, the fortress of Gibraltar excluded; (2) all losses caused to Russian citizens by detention and the variation of prices be compensated in full; (3) the orders for the capture of neutral ships be withdrawn as soon as possible, more effective control being inaugurated for the prevention of contraband.

Early in February Petersburg received the news of a British attack on Dutch ships; it provoked great indignation and was condemned as contrary to treaties and the law of nations. On February 17 Petersburg obtained the news of the Spanish capture of the Russian ship St. Nicolas. Catherine was indignant beyond measure. (Fauchille, p. 319 f.) The experience had convinced her that protests alone were of no avail.

She was determined under no circumstances to intervene in the war, and furthermore, to play the part of mediator; thus she resolved upon a league of neutrals, aimed at England, to secure neutral navigation and force her to negotiate peace. The Spanish and British conduct on the seas offered a convenient opportunity, and in a decree to the Admiralty (February 8–19, 1780), without consulting anyone, Catherine ordered that 15 ships be mobilized at Kronstadt and be ready to sail at a moment's notice. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 304 f; Fauchille, p. 320; Morskoi Sbornik, Doc. XIX–2; Bancroft-Circourt, III, p. 235. Potemkin represented this step to Harris as directed against Spain. Harris was convinced that it was intended for the protection of Russian commerce. Harris, I, p. 270. The mobilization of the fleet disturbed the French party also—the Empress had consulted nobody; was she under Harris's influence? Panin himself was surprised, but he was sure that no matter where the influence came from Catherine always had in view to preserve neutrality. Fauchille, p. 323 f; Bancroft-Circourt, III, p. 236 f; Goertz, pp. 26–27.)

Count Panin expressed himself before the French and Prussian ambassadors that under the circumstances if the Court of Madrid adopts an accommodating attitude, the measure would work out against England. On February 29, the ambassadors wrote to their Governments, urging that it was essential that Spain be accommodating and return a favorable reply to the Russian note. (Doniol, IV, p. 436; Fauchille, p. 324 f; Bancroft-Circourt, III, p. 240 f; for Frederick's instructions to Goltz in Paris on the importance that Spain satisfy Russia's demand see Bancroft-Circourt, III, p. 242; for Frederick's letter to Goertz that Spain will satisfy Russia's demands, ibid., III, pp. 243–247.) Vergennes pressed Florida-Blanca to respect the rights of neutrals and instructed Corberon to assure the Russian Government of French pressure being exercised in Madrid. Florida-Blanca persisted in his uncompromising attitude, and Vergennes instructed Montmorin to inquire of the Spanish minister if he had the intention of forcing Russia on the side of England. Finally Florida-Blanca promised to render a favorable reply to Russia. What disturbed him, however, was that the Russian note did not deal with the case of the Concordia only but with a league of neutrals. (Fauchille, pp. 327 f, 330 f. Florida-Blanca promulgated special regulations concerning navigation, and when the Russian representative in Madrid reclaimed the St. Nicolas, which had already been condemned by the court, he restored it at once—Fauchille, p. 332.)

As a matter of fact, Catherine's designs were neither as represented by Potemkin nor such as feared by the French in Petersburg. Harris was right that the step aimed at the protection of Russian navigation and Florida-Blanca correct when he stated that the Russian note concerning the Concordia had in view a league of neutrals. (Fauchille, p. 332 f; Doniol, IV, p. 435.) Realizing that Russia alone was unable to impose upon the belligerents respect for the freedom of neutral navigation, Catherine determined to form a league for the purpose. Still holding to his previous opinion that Russia should not assume obligations for the defense of foreign interests, and fearing that such a step might embroil Russia in the war, Count Panin opposed Catherine's idea. Whereupon the Empress charged his assistant, Bakounin, to explain the contemplated step to his superior. With great difficulty Bakounin succeeded in his mission. (This version of the part played by Count Panin in the decision concerning the declaration is given by Catherine herself. After the brilliant success of the policy of the first armed neutrality, credit for it was claimed from all sides. Catherine was aware of this and of the story current at the time that the declaration was a coup on the part of Count Panin, intended to upset the successful intrigues of Potemkin and Harris to involve Russia on the side of Great Britain. After reading in "Oeuvres posthumes de Frederic II, Roi de Prusse" (14 vols. Berlin, 1788), where the claim is advanced that Frederick had an idea similar to the armed neutrality, Catherine penned a note settling the matter of the authorship of the declaration. For details see the bibliographical notes. Vide, Nicolas Barsoukov, Dnevnik A. V. Khrapovitzkavo (St. Petersburg, 1874), p. 485; cf. Goertz, p. 10 f.)

It appears that Count Panin's attitude in the matter forced Catherine to communicate to him her wishes in writing. The imperial order stated that "Her Majesty considers it as her duty and in conformity with the dignity of the country to defend the honor of her flag and the security of her subject's commerce and navigation against any of the belligerents whatever. Before forcible measures be adopted, however, representations should be made for redress. Her Majesty contemplates dispatching her fleet wherever honor, necessity, and usefulness shall demand. Her Majesty pleases that all discussions with both belligerent parties be conducted on this basis.

Apart from this, Her Majesty finds necessary the measures being adopted by Russia be communicated to the courts of Denmark, Sweden, Portugal, and the Republic of Holland, inviting them to common action so far as the defense of neutral commerce and navigation is concerned, strict neutrality being observed toward the belligerents. In similar declarations, communicated to the British and both Bourbon courts, Her Majesty consfders it necessary to define exactly what is to be understood under the term of freedom of commerce, contraband of war, and to mention the means which are to be employed in the defense of commerce and navigation. Her Majesty pleases that all communications in connection with this, a project of convention with the other courts equally interested in the matter also included, be prepared as soon as possible and presented for her approval. Furthermore, Her Majesty pleases that Count Nikita Ivanovitch (Panin) and the Vice Chancellor (Ostermann), treating this order as establishing the rules on the subject, use them as a basis in their discussions with the ministers of the foreign powers; and also the Russian ministers in Madrid, Paris, London, The Hague. Lisbon, Copenhagen, and Stockholm hold similar language. (Morskoi Sbornik, pp. 88–90, Doc. XIX/1 (the original in Besborodko's handwriting; read and approved by Her Majesty on February 14–25); cf. Fauchille, p. 333 f.)

Thus Catherine had in view a general league of neutrals, and even if it be admitted that the Spanish seizure was the immediate pretext of this policy, its object was much wider; it was directed against all belligerents. Panin's instructions dealt with the freedom of navigation in general, not with the Spanish case which was one of blockade, but with the definition of contraband of war, the effect of which was directed against England. Furthermore, these instructions indicated a benevolent attitude toward Spain; friendly negotiations, the good offices of Spain's ally (France) being employed. Thus the idea of the armed neutrality belonged to the Empress and it had occurred to her before the Spanish seizure of the St. Nicolas, and before the order for the mobilization of the fleet. (Fauchille, p. 335 f; cf. Wharton, III, p. 558 (J. Adams to Congress, March 18, 1780.) One month previously to the declaration Catherine spoke about her intentions in a letter addressed to Grimm. Several months in advance Galitzin had been instructed to insinuate the idea of the league at The Hague. Toward the middle of February Galitzin had reported the favorable results of his conversations concerning a common defense of maritime commerce against Great Britain. (Fauchille, p. 338; cf. Doniol, IV, p. 436.)

On the same day of her instructions to Panin, Catherine wrote personally to Prince Galitzin, Russian minister at The Hague, instructing him to sound and persuade the Dutch Government in favor of acting in common with Russia as regards the measures to be taken for the protection of the freedom of neutral commerce against both belligerents. Galitzin was instructed to ascertain if they were inclined to participate in representations addressed to both belligerents, defining the terms of neutral freedom of commerce and navigation and contraband of war, stating that Russia could no longer remain indifferent to the injuries to her flag and the property of her subjects. Catherine concluded that additional instructions would depend upon his favorable report. (Morskoi Sbornik, p. 335–6, Doc. XXI; cf. Fauchille, p. 337 f.)

While Harris was kept in ignorance by Catherine, and deceived as to her intentions by Potemkin, Count Stroganov confided to Corberon that the mobilization of the fleet had in view the protection of Russian navigation, and that to achieve it a league of neutrals would be formed. Panin also gave some information on the subject to the French and Prussian representatives. After receiving the instructions of the Empress, Panin spoke of the league of neutrals, presenting it as a system of his own and stating that he would use his efforts to persuade the Empress in favor of it. He did not mention the instructions of the Empress which already were in his hands. Panin also said that once Catherine should accept a league against all belligerents, he would transform it into one against England, stating that it was necessary only that pressure be brought to bear at Madrid for the acceptance of the Russian reclamations; this was also contained in the instructions given him by the Empress. Thus Panin was doing nothing but carrying out the instructions of the Empress, and insuring their success in his own peculiar way, and obtaining credit for a step which he had opposed. (Fauchille, p. 339 ff; Bancroft-Circourt, III, p. 239, 241. This is the explanation of the story of Panin's intrigue to upset Harris's schemes. Not possessing information as to how matters really were, Corberon and Goertz accepted it, the latter put it in print (vide Goertz, p. 14 f), and British publicists began to exploit it in their efforts to discredit the armed neutrality.)

On March 6 Panin presented to Catherine the drafts which he had been instructed to prepare, and on the 8th he visited Corberon to tell him the news. Explaining the attitude of the Empress in connection with the declaration, he once more ascribed to himself the credit for this result, insisting once more that pressure be exercised in Madrid in order that the demands of the Empress be completely fulfilled. (Goertz, p. 29; Fauchille, p. 343 f. Panin had also given the same information to Goertz, which the latter reported on the 10th. It is noteworthy that this time Panin requested that the information be kept strictly secret and withheld from the Russian representatives in Paris and Berlin in order that he be not compromised.)

On February 28–March 11, 1780, followed the famous Russian declaration of the first armed neutrality, addressed to England, France, and Spain. (Supra, p. 5.) At the time the Russian Government issued the declaration formal proposals were made to Denmark, Sweden, Portugal, and Holland to join in the measures which Russia proposed to take, and to conclude the necessary conventions for the joint protection of the freedom of neutral commerce and navigation, and in this manner "a new system based on natural law be established" and imposed upon the belligerents. All neutral cabinets met the Russian declaration with great satisfaction, because, according to contemporary diplomats, it reestablished the law of nations on the seas, suppressing the claims of the stronger, and all this was achieved by a stroke of the pen while bloody wars had failed to attain it in the past. (Obolensky, p. 37; Morskoi Sbornik, Doc. XXIII, pp. 338–341 (Catherine to Sacken, Copenhagen, February 28–March 11); Doc. XXIV, pp. 342–345 (Catherine to Ruckmann, Stockholm, February 28–March 11); Doc. XXV, pp. 345–348 (Catherine's rescripts to the Russian ministers in Paris, London, and Madrid, February 28–March 11); Doc. XXVI, p. 349 (Panin to Bariatinsky); Doc. XXVII, pp. 350–352 (Catherine's rescripts to Nesselrode, Lisbon, and Galitzin, The Hague); Doc. XXVIII, pp. 353–354 (Catherine's rescript to Zinoviev, Madrid). A circular rescript was sent also to the Russian representatives in Mitava, Danzig, Berlin, Hamburg, Dresden, Warsaw, Regensburg, Vienna, Venice, Neapol, and Constantinople; the original signed by Panin and Ostermann and dated February 28–March 11: Morskoi Sbornik: Doc. XXIX, p. 355. Apart from the circular concerning the declaration, special instructions were dispatched to Bariatinsky in Paris and Zinoviev in Madrid. Bariatinsky was instructed to inform the French minister of the Spanish capture and to demand his intervention in the affair before the Court of Madrid. Zinoviev was instructed to express the indignation of the Empress, and to reclaim complete satisfaction and assurances that in the future Russian commerce would be respected: Fauchille, p. 362; Morskoi Sbornik; Nos. XXVI, XXVIII.)

In September, 1778, Denmark had proposed to Russia and Sweden a maritime league against England. This proposal was rejected by Russia (Supra, p. 23), and from March, 1779, under the supposition that Russian policy favored England and in order to win Russian good will, Danish policy had turned toward England. When the Russian declaration reached Copenhagen Bernstorff expressed satisfaction, considering that the mobilization of the Russian fleet was directed against Spain. When the Russian representative in Copenhagen invited Denmark to join the league of neutrals (Morskoi Sbornik, No. XXIII), intending to follow his pro-English policy of late, Bernstorff, in the council of March 29, maintained that Russia was not strong enough to follow such a policy; that opposition to Russian designs would result in special concessions on the part of England; and that if such were granted to all neutrals the Netherlands, having the greatest fleet, would obtain the chief advantage. The council, however, rejected Bernstorff's reasoning and decided to follow Russia. (Fauchille, pp. 402–405.) In accordance with this decision a note was handed to the Russian representative on March 30. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. XXXII; Fauchille, p. 406 ff.)

In spite of this, Bernstorff persisted in his attitude, intending that the declaration be turned against Spain. The more the cabinet inclined toward adopting Russia's policy, the more Bernstorff was bent upon preventing such a policy. He went so far as to send to the representative of Denmark in Petersburg instructions contrary to the decisions of the council. But Prince Frederick informed the representative of Denmark in Petersburg of the real intentions of the government, and Goertz informed Count Panin. Thus Bernstorff's efforts were exposed in the Russian reply and rejected by the King. (Fauchille, p. 409, 412 f, 416; Bancroft-Circourt, III, p. 246 f; Morskoi Sbornik, No. XXXIX; Cf. Harris, I, p. 311 (for Harris's efforts to prevent the formation of the league).) In a dispatch to the belligerents, dated May 8, Denmark declared the Baltic a closed sea on account of its geographical situation and the fact that the nations bordering on it were at peace. (Scott, p. 290; Martens (1st ed. II, p. 84; 2d ed. III, p. 175); Piggott and Omond, p. 219; on the views of Denmark, see Goertz, p. 227; Piggott and Omond, p. 205 f.) The French Government acknowledged this claim. (Scott, p. 295; Martens (2d ed.), III, p. 176.) Finally, in a declaration to the belligerents, dated July 8, Denmark acceded to the Russian declaration (Scott, p. 297 f; Martens (1st ed., IV, p. 360; 2d ed., III, p. 178); Piggott and Omond, p. 219 f; Wharton, IV, p. 31), and on July 9 signed a formal convention with Russia, the general object of which was to secure freedom of commerce and navigation, in the spirit of the declaration, by means of cooperation and reciprocal defense. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. XLVI; Marten et Cussy, 1 p. 214; Scott, p. 299 ff; Piggott and Omond, p. 238–237; Martens (1st ed., II, p. 103; 2d ed., III, p. 189). Additional article declaring the Baltic a closed sea: Scott, p. 305; Piggott and Omond, p. 237 f; Martens (1st ed., IV, p. 357; 2d ed., III, p. 195.)

On July 25 England replied to the declaration of Denmark in the negative. The reply stated that in the past England had strictly observed the treaties, and would do the same in the future. (Martens (1st ed.), VI, p. 203; (2d ed.) III, p. 182; Martens et Cussy, I, p. 209; Piggott and Omond, p. 221 f.) On August 7 Spain rendered a favorable reply, similar to the one she gave to Petersburg. (Martens (1st ed.) VI, p. 204; (2d ed.) III, p. 183; Martens et Cussy, I, p. 210; Scott, p. 320; Piggott and Omond, p. 225 f. The reply of the French Government (Scott, p. 309; Piggott and Omond, p. 224 f; Martens, 1st ed., IV, p. 363; 2d ed., III, p. 180).)

The adhesion of Denmark to the declaration, however, was not complete. Bernstorff still persisted in his intention of serving the interests of England by neutralizing the effect of the league. In his efforts to achieve such a result, Bernstorff misled the council by a proposal for an explanatory convention to the Anglo-Danish treaty of 1670 which, he stated, treated naval stores as contraband of war. Thus an agreement with the English was reached and the convention signed on July 4, 1780, and ratified by Denmark on the 21st. (Clausen, p. 140; British and Foreign State Papers; I, pt. 1, p. 400; Scott, p. 295 f; Piggott and Omond, p. 222 f; Martens, II, p. 102; Martens et Cussy, I, p. 205.) According to the convention, England permitted Danish trade in food supplies, and Denmark assumed the obligation not to supply England's enemies with contraband goods. This convention was disadvantageous to Denmark. By the convention with Russia and Sweden, Denmark had secured for her merchant marine the trade in naval stores, but the convention with England made this impossible. (Fauchille, p. 428, 430 ff.)

In order to mask his conduct, in September, Bernstorff officially acceded to the convention between Russia and Sweden. However, the truth soon became known; the King of England published a proclamation to the effect that the convention prevented Denmark from supplying the enemies of England. Questioned, Bernstorff represented the convention as natural and advantageous. Count Panin was extremely irritated and took steps to repair the damage, while Catherine suggested that Bernstorff be replaced. An energetic Russian note, disapproving the conduct of Bernstorff and charging him with duplicity went to Copenhagen. Thus the council became aware of Bernstorff's game, but the thing had been done and a denunciation of the convention with England was dangerous. Bernstorff, however, was replaced. (Fauchille, p. 434 f, 438 f, 441–444. After England declared war on the Netherlands, Denmark was threatened with a similar treatment if the convention with England remained unobserved: Fauchille, p. 451 f.)

In the first months of 1780 the relations between the Netherlands and England were strained on account of the seizure of a Dutch convoy. At the beginning of February, the Russian representative at The Hague, supported by his French colleague, had insinuated the idea of a league against England. Toward the end of the month, the Prince of Nassau charged Galitzin to inquire of the Empress if she found acceptable a concert with the States General on the means of protection of navigation in general. (Fauchille, p. 492 f.) On February 14–25 Catherine had already transmitted to The Hague her resolution for the mobilization of the fleet, and Galitzin was instructed to ascertain the disposition of the Netherlands. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. XXI.) On March 11 she rendered her declaration and Galitzin was instructed to invite the States General to adhere. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. XXVII.) On April 3 Galitzin transmitted the declaration, inviting the States General to adhere by sending to the belligerents a declaration founded on the same principles and by joining the league of neutrals. (Ch. de Martens, II, p. 286; Fauchille, p. 493 f; Scott, p. 275 f; Cf. Wharton, III, p. 599 (J. Adams to Congress, April 7, 1780), p. 606 f.) Galitzin's representations produced a strong impression, and on April 24 the States General acceded to the declaration. (Martens, IV, p. 350 ff; Martens et Cussy, I, p. 198; cf. Wharton, III, p. 627.) On May 19 the reply was communicated to Petersburg, condemning the arbitrary practice of the belligerents, conforming to the principles of the declaration, and expressing readiness to make a similar declaration to the belligerents. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. XXXVIII; Martens (2d ed.), III, p. 168; Scott, p. 283 f; Fauchille, pp. 493 f, 496.)

The position of England became critical. It was in vain that she suspended the treaties with the Netherlands, and authorized her privateers to seize Dutch ships with enemy cargoes and naval stores. For England it was practically impossible to interfere with the transport of naval stores protected by the fleets of the northern powers. A new course was necessary. For the Dutch trade was all important, and it needed peace. Now the English threatened the Netherlands with a declaration of war. (Fauchille, p. 496 ff.) Under the circumstances, the Netherlands were placed in the position of counting on Russia. In Petersburg, Sir James Harris employed all means to prevent Russia from affording assistance to the Netherlands. (Harris, I, p. 311. (Harris wrote to Potemkin and even attempted to intimidate the Empress. He demanded the recall of Galitzin, and maintained that the Netherlands were an interested party and could not be included in the neutrals, and that if Russia united with them, she would find herself embroiled in the war).) At first, the British threats obtained some effect at The Hague, but the preparations of the fleet went on, the States General persisted in their attitude and the French and Prussian representatives pressed them to negotiate the convention with Russia. (Fauchille, p. 501.) In order to force the Netherlands to turn to Russia for protection in a measure which would make Catherine hesitate in signing an alliance with them, England redoubled the violence of her treatment of the Dutch. The English knew that Catherine would not be disposed to go to war for the Dutch; and even if she did, Sweden and Denmark would not dare follow, and thus the league would break down. (Fauchille, p. 505 f; Wharton, III, p. 705.)

Under the circumstances, the Dutch intended to ask Russia for a guarantee. Such a demand threatened the success of the negotiations, and the French attempted to persuade the States General to negotiate the convention first. Their efforts failed and on July 1, the States General decided to demand a guaranty of their possessions as the price of their accession to the convention. Thus while Russia was interested only in the freedom of commerce and navigation, the Dutch desired an alliance against English attacks. (Fauchille, pp. 507–513; Wharton, IV, p. 53.)

Vergennes insisted that the States General should not present the demand of a guaranty as a condition of their accession, because if they remained alone their position would be worse. If they negotiated the convention, France would second them both in Petersburg and in Stockholm. Vergennes's attitude, Catherine's dissatisfaction at the delay and her inclination to form the league without the Netherlands, decided the latter to solicit the guaranty as an act of benevolence. (Fauchille, p. 514–517; Wharton, IV, p. 72.)

The French supported the Dutch in Petersburg. Count Panin replied that a guaranty was unnecessary, because the convention stipulated that if one of the contracting parties was attacked on account of her accession all others would unite in her support. A conference of the Dutch envoys with Panin on September 10 was enough to secure the adhesion of the States General to the convention, as proposed by Russia. Panin spoke firmly, the envoys were satisfied, and a messenger was dispatched to The Hague with Panin's declaration. (Fauchille, p. 522 f, 528 f, 532 ff. In the meantime, through the agency of Potemkin, Harris attempted to upset the negotiations, but the latter was unable to help him. About this time, also, the English proposal of compensation was made to Russia. Harris, I, p. 331, 337, 345.) On November 20 the States General decided upon the accession to the convention and a declaration to the belligerents. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. 59; Martens, IV, p. 375; Fauchille, p. 537 f; Wharton, IV, p. 160, 234.)

In 1779, convinced that Catherine was on the side of England and was on the eve of signing an alliance, Sweden had maintained a favorable attitude toward England. (Gustav III, judging by appearances, was easily misled by the English representative in Stockholm. Fauchille, p. 453.) At the beginning of 1780, however, things began to clear up. Spain, influenced by Vergennes, adopted a more moderate attitude on the seas, and Stockholm was in a position to obtain more reliable information as to Catherine's intentions. As soon as it became known that the rumors for an Anglo-Russian alliance were spread from London with the intention to deceive, Sweden improved her treatment of France. On March 14 the news of the mobilization of the Russian fleet arrived in Stockholm and was a surprise to the Government of Sweden, which was uncertain as to the meaning of the measure, whether against Spain or England. On March 21 the declaration arrived, and Sweden was invited to make common cause with Russia for the protection of neutral navigation. (Fauchille, p. 454 ff; Morskoi Sbornik, No. XXIV; for the additional explanations of the Russian representative in connection with this communication, vide: D'Albedyhll, p. 74, App. E.) In spite of the fact that the declaration was explicit, in Stockholm some doubts still remained. On March 23 the Swedish Minister, Scheffer, informed the French representative of the Russian representations and declared that the King did not know what reply to give; he had no desire to offend the Empress nor to see her play a part superior to his own in the reestablishment of peace. Besides, Sweden was not inclined to choose between France and England; she was interested in retaining the French subsidies, but feared a complete break with England. (Fauchille, p. 456.)

Under the circumstances the French representative did not know what counsel to give and proposed that Sweden concert with France. Scheffer replied that such a step would require time, and that since Russia was adopting the proposal made by Sweden a year ago, the latter could not very well contradict herself. The French representative now proposed that time be gained to ascertain the attitude of the French by a dilatory answer, requesting explanations. Scheffer agreed to this, and the thing was done; the Swedish Government demanded explanations as to the manner in which reciprocal protection and mutual assistance should be given. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. XXXVII; Wharton, IV, p. 36 f; Martens (1st ed.), IV, p. 354; (2d ed.) III, p. 170; Martens et Cussy, I, p. 250; Piggott and Omond, p. 203; Scott, p. 276 f; Fauchille, p. 456 ff; for the report of the Russian representative (March 25–April 5) to Panin concerning his conversation with Scheffer on the matter, vide; Morskoi Sbornik, No. XXXVI; cf. Wharton, III, p. 660 f.) At the same time Scheffer instructed the Swedish representative in Paris to communicate the reply given to Russia and confer confidentially with Vergennes on the subject.

Scheffer wrote that no obligation had been assumed as yet, and that the King was free to act both in his own interests and those of France. The reason against adopting the Russian proposal was that the real intentions of the Empress were unknown; the reason in favor of the step, Scheffer said, was that the principles of the declaration were directed against England; the main fear of the King was that the Empress might embroil him in the war. Vergennes was already clear as to what the intentions of the Empress were, and on April 6 wrote to the French representative in Stockholm to press the King in a most urgent manner for a favorable reply to the Russian proposal. (Fauchille, p. 460–463. On April 13, Vergennes wrote once more, stating that while his previous dispatch was based on conjectures, these were now definite. On April 18, Vergennes received the report of the French representative in Stockholm asking advice on the subject; now he replied in a most categorical manner, dissipating all doubts as to the attitude Sweden should adopt.)

The Swedish Government hesitated until the representative in London reported that the declaration was met with dissatisfaction by the English Government. The English attack on the Dutch ships and Catherine's indignation cleared the situation even more. On April 19, Denmark notified Stockholm of her intention to accept the principles of the declaration and inquired as to the attitude Sweden proposed to adopt. On April 26, Scheffer replied that Sweden was disposed to adhere. In the meantime, Vergennes's approval of the declaration arrived, and the French representative expressed himself in favor of a convention similar to the treaty of Utrecht, enabling all powers to accede, ad thus a universal code for the freedom of the seas might be established. (Fauchille, p. 465 f; Cf. Wharton, III, p. 695 f.) Now, Scheffer became active immediately. Without waiting for the explanation demanded from Russia, on April 30, he submitted to the council his project of a convention, and, on May 1, it was dispatched to Petersburg with the authorization of the Swedish representative to sign. (Fauchille, p. 467 f; for the project of Sweden, vide, Ibidem, App. B., p. 594 ff.) The Russian reply to the explanations demanded by Sweden arrived in Stockholm after the Swedish project had been dispatched. The explanations were found satisfactory and in accordance with the project of Sweden. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. XXXVII; Martens, (1st ed.) IV, p. 355; (2d ed.) III, p. 171; Piggott and Omond, p. 204 f; Scott, p. 288 f; Fauchille, p. 471 f; Wharton, IV, p. 37.)

On June 17, Count Panin replied to the project of Sweden by a counter project, which made the terms more exact without important modifications of the Swedish proposal. On July 13 Scheffer authorized the representative of Sweden in Petersburg to sign the convention. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. XLII; Fauchille, p. 472–477. The counter project was presented in order that Catherine be not deprived of the leading part she had assumed. The delay was occasioned by the conduct of Denmark.) On July 21, Sweden addressed a declaration to the belligerents, adopting the principles of the Russian declaration and stating that the government would continue to observe neutrality, but would effectually protect their lawful trade by all possible means. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. XLIII; Martens, (1st ed.) IV, p. 365; (2d ed.) III, p. 185; Piggott and Omond, p. 226 f; Scott, p. 307 f; Wharton, IV, p. 30.) On August 1, the convention between Russia and Sweden was signed in Petersburg. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. XLVIII; Martens, (1st ed.) II, p. 110; (2d ed.) III, p. 198; Piggott and Omond, p. 239–243; Scott, p. 311 f; Wharton, IV, p. 53; Martens et Cussy, I, p. 220. (For the additional article declaring the Baltic a closed sea: Scott, p. 317; Piggott and Omond, p. 227 f; Martens, (1st ed.) IV, p. 364; (2d ed.) III, p. 205.) In September, Sweden acceded to the Russian-Danish convention: Morskoi Sbornik, No. XLIV; Martens, (1st ed.) IV, p. 369, etc.)

The accession of Sweden to the Russian declaration was highly undesirable for England, and, as in the case with Denmark, she made an attempt to offset the step Sweden had taken in the matter. To accomplish her purpose England made use of an interpretation of the Anglo-Swedish treaty of 1661, prescribing a certificate for the character of merchandise on board. (Hautefeuille, Des droits et des devoirs des nations neutres, III, p. 300; Fauchille, p. 485.) The terms of the treaty were ambiguous; the English needed something more explicit for seizing enemy property under the flag of Sweden, and not finding it in the treaty they did not hesitate to imply its existence.

England replied to the Swedish declaration, claiming that her practice followed the principles of justice and equity, and that she had fulfilled with fidelity all engagements toward the friendly and neutral powers. Finally the reply contained a quotation claimed as being obligatory between the two nations as contained in the treaty of 1661. (Scott, p. 317; Piggott and Omond, p. 227 f; Martens et Cussy, I, p. 213; Martens (1st ed.), IV, p. 368; (2d ed.) III, p. 188.) The English reply reached Stockholm on September 15, and at first it was not disclosed that the Latin quotation contained in it was a falsification of the terms of the treaty of 1661. (The addition made by the English was: "Si hostis bona in confoederati navigio reperiantur, quod ad hostem pertinet praedae solummodo cedat, quod ad confoederatum illico restituatur." For the two texts of the treaty, Cf. Chalmer's Collection, I, p. 53 f; Jenkinson's Collection, I. p. 169; Fauchille, p. 487 ff; Piggott and Omond, p. 229 f.) When, however, the English made public their reply, fearing that the position of Sweden would be compromised both in Petersburg and Paris, Scheffer exposed the falsification, and made corresponding representations in London, adding that the treaty in question was nothing but a defensive alliance for 10 years, the term of which had expired more than a century ago. The matter ended in January, 1781, the English admitting formally the falsification and renouncing their claims based on the treaty of 1661. (Fauchille, p. 488 ff. The French Government acknowledged the declaration of Sweden. Martens (1st ed.), IV, p. 366; (2d ed.) III, p. 186; Martens et Cussy, I, p. 212; Scott, p. 318 f; Piggott and Omond, p. 232; Wharton, IV, p. 36; cf. Fauchille, p. 480.)

The declaration arrived in Paris on April 1 and was the cause of great satisfaction. Vergennes realized at once the advantages which the Burbon courts derived from it, and praised it to the Russian ambassador as the culmination of Catherine's glorious reign, as a step of honor, justice, and firmness, stating that he always appreciated Russia's friendship, but now more than ever before. (Soloviev (ed. O. P.), Bk. VI, 1177 f; Fauchille, p. 376 f.) The thing that disturbed Vergennes was how the declaration would be received in Madrid. (At that time he did not know yet of the new Spanish regulations and the release of the Russian ship, the St. Nicolas.) Therefore before replying to Petersburg, he initiated action in Madrid. On April 3, Vergennes instructed Montmorin to speak to Florida-Blanca forcefully; at any price Spain should accept the principles of the Empress, showing him all the advantages of such a resolution. (On April 14, Vergennes wrote once more to Madrid on the subject; Fauchille, p. 379.) The situation at Madrid was not such as Vergennes supposed. The declaration was well received, and the Spanish Government had conveniently conciliated their regulations with the principles of the Empress. Vergennes could have expected nothing better from Spain, and as soon as he was informed of her attitude he replied to the Russian note on April 25; his reply was a complete approbation of the declaration. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. XXXIII; Martens (1st ed.), IV, p. 346; (2d ed.) III, p. 162; Ch. de Martens, III, p. 271; Piggott and Omond, p. 213 ff; Scott, p. 284 f; Wharton, III, p. 674.) The Spanish reply to the Russian declaration was entirely satisfactory; it stated that owing to the conduct of the English Navy, Spain was forced to disregard the neutral flag in the way of reprisals. The Spanish Government expressed readiness to respect the neutral flag of the courts that have consented or shall consent to defend it; it stated further that Spain conforms to the other points contained in the declaration. (Morskoi Sbornik, Doc. XXXIV; Wharton, III, p. 688, 758 f; Ch. de Martens, III, p. 271; Martens (1st ed., IV, p. 348; 2d ed., III, p. 164); Scott, p. 280 f; Piggott and Omond, pp. 206–208; Fauchille, p. 379 ff. Zinoviev handed the declaration to Count Florida-Blanca on April 15; the Spanish reply is dated April 18.)

Now Vergennes instructed Corberon to encourage the Russian Government to pursue vigorously the system of the Empress in order that it be established, maintaining that an embargo would solve the difficulties with England if such arose, and that such a policy would not embroil Russia in a war with England. At the same time, without waiting for a reply from Petersburg, Vergennes took the necessary steps in order that the principles of the declaration be observed by the ships of France. (Fauchille, p. 384 f.)

On May 16 Corberon communicated to Count Panin the French reply. The same day a most satisfactory report from the Russian ambassador in Paris arrived. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. LVII; Fauchille, p. 386; Wharton, III, p. 674 f.) A few days later Count Panin announced to Corberon the complete satisfaction of the Empress. At the same time Russian merchants were expressly authorized to ship naval ammunition for French and Spanish ports. (Harris protested against this measure; Harris, I, p. 301.) At first the Spanish reply did not entirely please Count Panin, because it explained Spanish conduct as reprisals due to the conduct of England. The explanations of Corberon and Normandez, however, reassured him as to Spain's intentions. (Due to French efforts Spain rallied around the principles of the declaration, and toward the end of June Spain enjoyed in Petersburg the same confidence as France; the Bourbon courts had completely gained Catherine's sympathies; Fauchille, p. 387 f.)

In London the declaration was handed by Simolin to Lord Stormont; its contents disturbed the latter considerably, while Lord Hillsborough characterized it as advantageous to France and Spain and very disagreeable to England. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 310 (Simolin's report of March 27–April 7); Bancroft-Circourt, III, p. 248. When Simolin reported the astonishment produced in London by the imperial declaration and that the King of England had regarded the mobilization of the Russian fleet as being made in his favor, Catherine said: "Et à quel titre a-t-il pu le croire; c'est apparémment M. Harris qui aura forgé ces chimères." Fauchille, p. 369 (Corberon's report, May 5, 1780). In Parliament the declaration was described as a hostile step against England, and a break was considered imminent. Lord Cambden declared that Catherine was attempting to dictate to all sea powers and undermine the fundamental principles of the law of nations; that the declaration was "a dangerous and arbitrary act"; and that England had no choice but either to declare war on Russia or to allow unlimited help rendered to her enemies. F. F. Martens, X, p. 312.) The official English reply was handed to Panin by Harris. It stated that the English Government acted toward friendly and neutral powers according to the principles acknowledged as the law of nations; it mentioned that precise orders had been given respecting the Russian flag and commerce, "agreeable to the law of nations," and that the orders had been renewed; in case of infringements the English courts of admiralty were to afford redress. (Morskoi Sbornik, Doc. XXXV, p. 370 f; Scott, p. 282; Piggott and Omond, p. 208 f; Ch. de Martens, III, p. 270; Martens (2d ed.), III, p. 160; for Stormont's instructions to Harris in connection with the reply see Piggott and Omond, p. 209 f; Wharton, III, p. 661 f.) Thus the English Government attempted to evade the issue and continue its previous practice. (Obolensky, p. 37. The English reply to Russia was sent on April 11 and reached Harris on May 4; in the meantime the English did not communicate it to Simolin, in order to gain time and make use of Potemkin's influence (Harris, I, pp. 292, 295). Harris saw Potemkin first, and being unsuccessful he saw Panin the next day; and, exceeding his instructions, assured him that England had no intention of declining the Russian declaration entirely, but not of conforming to those principles which were directly against her interests and of evident advantage to her enemies. He begged Panin to transmit this to the Empress. Panin consented, declaring in a solemn manner that he was not the author of the declaration and that in this case he had acted exclusively as secretary to his sovereign (Harris, I, p. 301). A few days later Harris returned for the result. Panin replied that the Empress made no observations, and he now assumed a hostile attitude, while before seeing Catherine he had been reserved. This made it clear that Catherine was dissatisfied with the English reply and Harris's explanations (Harris, I, p. 301; Fauchille, p. 373 ff).)

In spite of the declaration and the attitude assumed by Russia, the English Government continued to entertain hopes of Russian assistance. So that the English minister was exceedingly displeased when he received communications from Simolin informing him that the Empress had issued orders for the formation of three squadrons, one to cruise the Mediterranean, the second the Atlantic, and the third the Sound and the North Sea. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 311 (Simolin's report of July 3–14); Cf. Wharton, III, p. 774 f.) However, officially they persisted in their previous point of view, and Lord Stormont declared that the Government intended to be guided by its special engagements and the generally acknowledged principles of the law of nations. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 312 (Simolin's report of July 7–18).) Toward the middle of June the three Russian squadrons, intended to uphold the system of the armed neutrality on the seas, sailed from Cronstadt. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. XL; Harris, I, p. 317; Fauchille, p. 388 f; Wharton, III, p. 874. While the fleet at Cronstadt was preparing to sail, an attempt was made to blow it up. The Russian Government and the diplomatic corps ascribed this to Harris, as being done through an English officer. Harris did not protest. One month afterwards he mentioned it to Potemkin, and on August 1 he mentioned it to Stormont. Harris, I, p. 327; Fauchille, p. 390.)

At the opening of hostilities with England, the American Colonies in their treaties and naval regulations adopted rules similar to the principles proclaimed by Russia. (The convention with France of February 6, 1778, and the proposed convention with the Netherlands proclaimed the principle "free ship, free goods." The same principle was also recognized in the instructions of Congress of April 10, 1776 (renewed on May 9, 1778), Martens, VI, p. 178; IV, p. 197.) In practice, however, the Colonies never respected the neutral flag, and the acts of American privateers in 1778–79 furnished Catherine with a pretext for the neutralization of the North Sea. Considering the American Colonies as rebels, Catherine did not communicate the declaration to the American Government. However, Franklin and John Adams communicated it to Congress. The French Cabinet was interested to see the Colonies adopt the Russian principles, and after the American privateer, the Black Prince, had seized the Dutch ship, the Flora, Vergennes urged Franklin to condemn the action of the privateer. At the same time, Vergennes charged the French representative in Philadelphia to explain the effect of the declaration and represent that the American Government conform to the French system and that of the neutrals. (Fauchille, pp. 394–398; Doniol, IV, p. 438; see also Wharton, IV, p. 508.) In the meantime the intention of Russia to take part in the future pacification becoming apparent, a movement in favor of Russia arose in Congress, so that the American Colonies, on October 5, 1780, adopted the declaration and decided upon a representative in Petersburg. The Continental Congress of the United States resolved: That the Board of Admiralty prepare and report instructions for the commanders of armed vessels commissioned by the United States to conform to the principles contained in the declaration of the Empress of Russia, on the right of neutral vessels. The ministers plenipotentiary from the United States, if invited, were respectively empowered to accede to such regulations, conformable to the spirit of the said declaration, as may be agreed upon by the Congress expected to assemble in pursuance of the invitation of Her Imperial Majesty: Scott, p. 323, 324; Piggott and Omond, pp. 280–281; Doniol, IV, p. 439; Journals of the Continental Congress, vol. 18, p. 905; Wharton, IV, p. 80; Fauchille, p. 398 f. For the commission of Francis Dana see: Journals, vol. XVIII, p. 1187; Piggott and Omond, p. 281; Hildt, ch. I; for Dana's correspondence see Wharton, vols. IV, V, and VI. Copies of the resolutions were transmitted to the American representatives abroad and the French plenipotentiary in the United States (cf. Wharton, IV, p. 274 f). For the ordinance of the United States in conformity with the principles of the armed neutrality, see: Wharton, V, p. 212.) Thus of the belligerents only England still opposed the principles of the Russian declaration.

Thus the accession of the northern powers to the armed neutrality was resulting in England's complete isolation. When the Prussian minister in London communicated to Lord Stormont the accession of Prussia (The convention between Prussia and Russia was signed on May 8–19, 1781: Morskoi Sbornik, No. LXIV; Scott, p. 397; Piggott and Omond, p. 252 f; Martens (1st ed.), II, p. 130; (2d ed.) III, p. 245; Martens et Cussy, I, p. 223; F. F. Martens, VI, p. 110; Wharton, IV, p. 424.) the English minister was very much concerned; he realized that the league of neutral powers was being firmly established, that on account of Catherine's attitude its dissolution was impossible to accomplish, and that under the circumstances England would be forced to modify her attitude. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 315 (Simolin's report of October 23–November 3, 1780).) Nevertheless, Lord Stormont declared to the Prussian minister that the Anglo-Russian treaties could not be extended to Prussia, and that in the future England would continue to act in conformity to the principles acknowledged generally as the law of nations. Upon Austria's accession to the armed neutrality (Morskoi Sbornik, No. LXV; Scott, p. 403; Piggott and Omond, p, 270 f; Martens (1st ed.), II, p. 171; (2d ed.) III, p. 257; F. F. Martens, II, p. 122; Martens et Cussy, I, p. 225) the English Government gave a similar reply. (F. F. Martens X, p. 316 (Simolin's report of December 17–28, 1781). On the margin of this report Catherine wrote, "When Harris communicates England's reply it would be useful to tell him that we shall be very glad to know clearly what are the principles of international law adopted by England, and we are convinced in advance that the right to pillage neutral ships can not be included in the number of these principles." In connection with the above marginal note of the Empress and the repeated references of the English Government as to their adherence to the law of nations, in January, 1781, Ostermann questioned Harris on the subject, stating that since the English Government repeatedly insisted upon the "principles of the law of nations recognized by England," a supposition was arising that to some extent these principles differed from the principles contained in the declaration of the Empress; therefore it was desirable to know definitely the principles adopted by His Britannic Majesty. Harris stated that he was not in a position to give a reply and that he would refer the question to London. When Simolin put the question to Lord Stormont the latter replied: "In all cases where the existing treaties are not applicable the matter is to be decided by the principles of the law of nations as established by the most eminent publicists." (F. F. Martens, X, pp. 316–317; Simolin's report of February 25–March 8, 1782.) Professor Martens says that this reply was "meaningless," and that Catherine never succeeded in obtaining from the English a definition of "the generally accepted principles of the law of nations" which England desired to apply to neutral navigation; and in the meantime, "the generally accepted principles" were transformed by the armed neutrality, England herself putting them into practice. The number of the powers acceding to the Russian declaration grew, and upon the accession of the States General, Lord Hillsborough exclaimed to Simolin: "You desire to establish a new code." Simolin replied that "so far such a code has not been in existence, but that it would be advantageous and useful to all nations that such a code be established." (F. F. Martens, X, p. 317; Simolin's report, April 24–May 5, 1780).)

In the meantime Harris made extraordinary efforts to influence Catherine to adopt a favorable attitude toward England (F. F. Martens, X, p. 312 (Harris to Panin, 20 April, O. S.)), but she remained firm in the support of the proclaimed principles. Nevertheless, Catherine had no warlike intentions toward England. She wrote to Simolin that the agreements with the neutral powers aimed only at the protection of neutral commerce and navigation, and that Russia would observe strict neutrality. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 313 (Catherine to Simolin, 26 October, O. S.).) At the same time, by adopting a threatening attitude, the English Government attempted to prevent the accession of the neutral powers to the league. In connection with this and the origin of the declaration, Catherine wrote to Simolin that it was England herself who provoked it by her unbearable orders to the privateers; that it was England's conduct in the arbitrary establishment of new rules concerning contraband of war, contrary to the exact terms of treaties, which forced Holland to seek French assistance. She wrote further that when England notified Holland that the treaties were to be superseded by the general English practice "it was then that we began to reflect upon the means to prevent in the future every misunderstanding and argument which might arise from ill-defined expressions, different points of view, and appreciation." Catherine concluded that England herself did not contest the rules of the declaration, having given orders accordingly, and instructed Simolin to declare to the English Government that Russia did not expect that the declaration would become the cause of an English war on Holland. (F. F. Martens, X, pp. 313–4 (Catherine to Simolin, January 13, 1781, O. S.).)

It was not long before the declaration achieved the desired effect and Catherine was satisfied with the English treatment of Russian ships. Express instructions were given to English privateers to strictly observe the provisions of the Anglo-Russian treaty of 1766 (Scott, p. 328 f; Piggott and Omond, p. 248; Hennings, II, p. 63), and Russian navigation was not interfered with. At the beginning of 1781 all Russian claims against England were fully compensated. Next the English Government became more considerate toward the trade and navigation of the other neutral powers and aditional instructions were given to English privateers respecting neutral property. (Scott, p. 365 f; Hennings, II, p. 105.) Finally, Catherine demanded that English privateers be excluded from the North Sea, its shores being in the exclusive possession of neutral powers only; the English Government fulfilled Catherine's demand. (Scott, p. 391; Hennings, II, p. 104.) The energetic representations of the Russian minister in London for the release of captured Swedish and Danish ships, were now, as a rule, granted by the English Government. (F. F. Martens, X, pp. 317–18.)

At the beginning of 1780 Portugal was on the side of England. The accommodations which the English ships found in Portugese ports were a valuable aid against the Bourbon courts. But, on account of Portugal's geographical position, her attitude was affecting neutral navigation also, and therefore Catherine desired that at any price Portugal should be separated from England.

The declaration was communicated at Lisbon, and Portugal was invited to adhere to it and join the league of neutrals. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. XXVII; Fauchille, p. 553–556.) Toward the end of April the Russian note arrived in Lisbon. The Portuguese made efforts to gain time until on June 27, 1780, a negative reply was rendered. In concert with Spain, Vergennes made all efforts to win the Portuguese. In the meantime, in August, English conduct in the ports of Portugal resulted in an embargo on English shipping. The French seized this opportunity and persuaded Portugal to exclude all privateers from her ports. Yet, fearing England on the seas, the Portuguese continued to persist in their policy of declining to adhere to the armed neutrality. The French continued their efforts at Lisbon and finally won. On May 24, 1782, the Russian representative in Lisbon notified Petersburg that Portugal had decided to accede to the northern league, and on July 13, 1782, the convention was signed at Petersburg. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. LXVIII; Martens et Cussy, I, p. 227; Martens, 1st ed., II, p. 208; 2d ed., III, p. 263; Fauchille, p. 557–575; Wharton, IV, p. 83 f.)

Having failed to prevent the accession of the States General to the league of neutrals, England determined to solve the problem by depriving the Netherlands of their status as a neutral by means of a declaration of war, thus depriving the Netherlands of the assistance of the league, and avoiding Russia's participation in the war. If the declaration of war became known in Petersburg before the accession of the Netherlands had been consummated it would not take place on account of the Netherlands being a belligerent; if the convention had been signed, the motive of the rupture being foreign to the league, a casus foederis in favor of the States General would not arise. The difficulty was in finding a pretext for the rupture. Circumstances came to the rescue of the English; an American ship was captured, and among the papers of Henry Laurens was found a project of a commercial treaty of August, 1778, between the States General and the American Colonies. Considered of a date when there was no question of armed neutrality, it furnished an excellent pretext for a declaration of war. (Fauchille, p. 540; Cf. Harris, I, p. 345. The alleged negotiations between the Netherlands and the American Colonies concerned a memorandum of the conversations between the American commissioner in Germany, William Lee, and the Dutch agent, Mr. Neufville, held in September, 1778, at Aix-la-Chapelle. In September, 1780, the memorandum fell into English hands. Wharton, II, p. 286; Piggott and Omond, p. 288.) Thus on November 10 the English representatives handed to the States General an ultimatum. (Ch. de Martens, II, p. 346; Piggott and Omond, p. 289 f; Annual Register, 1780, pp. 120, 141.)

The English counted upon the arrogance of their language to achieve the desired result. The French, however, opened the eyes of the Dutch as to the English tactics and cautioned them to manage the affair so as not to deprive themselves of the assistance of the league, which could be procured on no other basis but the violation of neutrality. (Fauchille, p. 543 f.) Thus the States General took the necessary steps to complete the formalities of their accession. In the meantime, on December 12, their reply to England started for London. The same evening the English representative at The Hague delivered a second ultimatum. (Ch. de Martens, II, p. 348.) The States General offered all possible satisfaction and it was refused by the English representative. (Ch. de Martens, II, p. 355.) In the meantime, on December 18, the Dutch declaration of their accession to the league arrived in London. Now the English decided that no time should be lost, if it was a question of coming to a rupture with the Netherlands before the convention with Russia was signed. The next day orders were sent to the English representative to quit The Hague, and on December 20 the relations with the representative of the States General in London were broken off. The same day a double proclamation announced the war with the States General (Ch. de Martens, II, p. 349; Scott, p. 330 ff; Piggott and Omond, p. 290; Hennings, I, p. 67; Annual Register, 1780, p. 142), and authorized English ships to seize all Dutch shipping. (Ch. de Martens, II, pp. 353, 372; Scott, p. 334 f; Wharton, IV, p. 219 ff; Hennings, I, p. 71; Piggott and Omond, p. 291; Annual Register, 1780, p. 144).

In the meantime, in Petersburg, Harris made all efforts to prevent the accession of the Netherlands to the league. However, Count Panin saw through the English game, and since the Empress had no intention of abandoning the negotiations, he hurried the signature of the convention. (Harris, I, pp. 347 f, 351 ff; Fauchille, p. 549. (At this time the position of England in Petersburg was very unfavorable. Three months previously the British had seized Russian ships, and those being reclaimed, the British replied that when the admiralty decided whether they were good prizes or not the Russian ambassador would be informed. On December 10 Catherine sent to London a dispatch reclaiming the ships once more and stating that the laws which the English admiralty might apply were absolutely foreign to the case; that she did not know other rules in the matter than the law of nations of her declaration, and that in spite of her desire to observe a scrupulous neutrality and an understanding with Great Britain, she had decided to protect by all means the honor of her flag and the navigation of her subjects: Fauchille, p. 550).) On January 4, 1781, the convention was signed. (Morskoi Sbornik, No. 63; Martens (1st ed.), II, p. 117; IV, p. 378; (2d ed.) III, p. 215. (While the declaration of war became known in Petersburg on January 10, the conduct of the English representative at The Hague was known before the signature, and the Russian Government knew what the outcome would be: Fauchille, p. 551).)

On February 28, 1781, the Netherlands addressed a memorandum to Sweden demanding support of the Armed Neutrality League in the war with England. The memorandum stated that England's resentment arose merely from the accession of the Netherlands to the armed neutrality, and therefore the latter was entitled to the assistance of the league. (Scott, p. 266 f; Annual Register, 1781, p. 311; Piggott and Omond, p. 307; Martens (1st ed), IV, p. 389; (2d ed.) III, p. 230; Ch. de Martens, III, p. 291; Wharton, IV, p. 335 ff.) The Government of Sweden addressed Russia on the subject, stating that, while it was clear that England's declaration of war on the Netherlands was actuated by the latter's accession to the armed neutrality, the English manifesto mentioned acts previous to the Netherlands accession, and the league was therefore free to choose between the reasoning of the Netherlands' memorandum or that of the English manifesto. (Scott, p. 370 f; Goertz, p. 199; Martens (2d ed.) III, p. 325; Piggott and Omond, p. 311.)

The Russian Government admitted that the time and circumstances of England's attack on the Netherlands sufficiently indicated that the real cause lay in the accession of the later to the armed neutrality, but that, on the other hand, the actual rupture preceded the formal accession of the Netherlands to the league and that the reasons set forth antedated and were foreign to the armed neutrality, therefore the Russian Government adopted the suggestion of Sweden that suitable representations be made in London. (Scott, p. 377; Goertz, p. 209; Piggott and Omond, p. 315; Ch. de Martens, III, p. 301; Martens (2d ed.), III, p. 240. (In January, 1781, Catherine instructed Simolin to employ all his efforts in preventing a break; before these instructions reached him, however, the war was declared and Lord Stormont attempted to convince him that England was forced into it by the Netherlands' maintenance of friendly relations with France and conclusions of treaties with America; that the cause of the war was foreign to the armed neutrality: F. F. Martens, X, p. 318 (Simolin's report, February 16–17, 1781); cf. Wharton, V, p. 116.))

Finally the status of the Netherlands was settled; as regards France and Spain the league considered the Netherlands as neutral, and as regards England—as belligerent. Thus the Netherlands remained in the League of the Arm Neutrality. (Scott, p. 374; Goertz, pp. 114, 220. The compromise was disadvantageous to the Bourbon courts; it meant that the league of neutrals protected Dutch ships only against France and Spain: Fauchille, p. 583.) In the meantime, Catherine proposed to mediate between England and the Netherlands. The latter accepted the Russian mediation, while England at first declined the proposal; but in September, 1781, modified her attitude and consented to it. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 318; Piggott and Omond, p. 321 f; Annual Register, 1781, p. 310.) In March, 1782, the English cabinet acquainted Simolin with their decision that England was willing to enter into a treaty of peace with the Netherlands on the basis of free navigation according to the treaty of 1764. (Piggott and Omond, p. 323; Cf. C. J. Fox, I, p. 321. (The above-mentioned mediation was taking place simultaneously with that of Catherine and Joseph II for general peace. In connection with the latter, Simolin wrote that under no circumstances would the English Government consent to discuss or recognize American independence; that the English Government considered the American issue of internal character, excluding the mediation of foreign powers in connection with it (F. F. Martens, X, p. 319). The mediation was one of Catherine's main objects. England associated Austria in it in order to influence the negotiations through the latter, and at the same time separate Russia from the Netherlands: Fauchille, p. 583 f; d'Albedyhll, p. 39; Doniol, IV, p. 523.))

In the meantime Harris was instructed to maintain most friendly relations with the Russian Government and to attempt once more the conclusion of an Anglo-Russian defensive alliance. For this purpose, in March, 1781, England proposed the cession of the island of Minorca to Russia. (Harris, I, pp. 345, 364, 368, 374.) Catherine was not willing to participate in conflicts which did not concern Russia, and therefore the proposal was declined. (F. F. Martens, X, pp. 319, 320.) Anglo-Russian relations remained at a standstill down to March, 1782, when Lord North's Cabinet fell and Fox became foreign secretary. The new cabinet was in favor of peace and inclined to recognize the independence of the American colonies. Fox attempted to effect a rapprochement with Russia, while Catherine aimed at taking advantage of his attitude, and obtaining England's formal recognition of the principles of the armed neutrality. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 323. Fox saw that unless he could make some concession to the northern powers on the subject of neutral rights it would be vain to hope to engage Catherine of Russia and Frederick of Prussia on the side of Great Britain. It seemed to Fox that on these questions of dispute great concessions might be made; Russell, Life of Fox, I, p. 299; Fox, I, p. 330 f.)

Simolin called Mr. Fox's attention to the attitude of the previous ministry as regards the principles of the armed neutrality. Fox replied that the English Government recognized the justice of these principles, and since under the circumstances England's reliance was upon Russia alone, all issues that might place obstacles to the rapprochement of the two countries would be eliminated immediately; if the recognition of the system of armed neutrality was one of these issues, it could be done easily. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 320 (Simolin's reports of April 1–12, 12–23, 1782.) Fox, in the letter to Grey, states that the first act of the Rockingham ministry was to make an offer to Holland upon the principles of the armed neutrality; and this was done with a view of satisfying the Empress of Russia: Russell, Life of Fox, I, p. 300.) In connection with this statement of Mr. Fox, Simolin was instructed to demand a written, formal recognition of the principles of the armed neutrality. Simolin was to point out that, as a matter of fact, during the war England applied these principles in practice by restoring the captured neutral ships by compensating the losses of neutral merchants; he was to give Fox to understand that the Empress was firmly resolved to maintain the principles proclaimed by her and to secure their universal recognition. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 321 (Ostermann to Simolin, May 15–26, 1782); Russell, Life of Fox, I, p. 300; Fox, I, p. 332.)

Under the circumstances the English Government decided to acquiesce in Catherine's wishes and formally declare that the principles of the armed neutrality proclaimed by the Russian Government should be considered as "generally acknowledged principles of the law of nations." On the 4th of May, 1782, Mr. Fox wrote to Simolin that His Britannic Majesty would accept as the basis of a separate peace between him and the states general, "a free navigation according to the principles demanded by Her Imperial Majesty in her declaration of February 28, 1780." (F. F. Martens, X, p. 322; Piggott and Omond, p. 325 f.; cf. Annual Register, 1782, p. 150; Fox, I, p. 330 ff.) This letter and the conversation with Mr. Fox on the subject convinced Simolin that the new British cabinet was ready to adhere formally to the declaration of the armed neutrality, in spite of the popular conviction that these principles had already served, and would continue to serve, England's enemies. But if the cabinet was in a position to say that against the recognition of these principles they have regained the benevolence of Russia and reestablish the alliance, then they were ready to make every sacrifice and expected to succeed in winning public opinion. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 322 (Simolin's report of June 7–18, 1782); Russell, Life of Fox, I, p. 302.)

Simolin's conviction was fully justified; Harris soon wrote to the Russian Vice-Chancellor, Ostermann: "I can take it upon myself to declare that the principles of the armed neutrality shall no more be an object of the two Courts, since the Court of England is disposed to recognize them, and I assume the responsibility that it will do all in its power to facilitate their consolidation." As a matter of fact, in his letter to Simolin of June 17–28, 1782, Mr. Fox announced the definite decision of the King of England to sign the declaration of the armed neutrality. (F. F. Martens, X, pp. 322–23 (Simolin's report of June 17–28, 1782). Cabinet Minute, June 26, 1782: "It is humbly recommended to his Majesty to direct Mr. Fox to acquaint M. Simolin that His Majesty is desirous of entering fully into the ideas of the Empress, and to form the closest connections with the Court of Petersburg, and that His Majesty is willing to make the principles of Her Imperial Majesty's declaration of February 28, 1780, the basis of a treaty between the two countries." Piggott and Omond, p. 326; Fox, I, p. 333.)

Mr. Fox made the formal recognition of the armed neutrality rest upon the conclusion of the alliance. Now, Catherine was in a position to attain a brilliant victory by England's formal recognition of these principles, but she definitely refused to entertain the English proposal. Catherine refused to renew the alliance in spite of England's formal consent to include even the casus foederis against Turkey in the proposed treaty. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 323; Fox, I, p. 333.) Ostermann declared to Harris that the Empress had definitely decided to assume no obligations toward any of the belligerents. Harris replied that at least a secret Anglo-Russian treaty might be signed, coming into effect at the termination of the war. Ostermann declined the proposal, declaring such a treaty unnecessary and eventually capable of becoming a source of embarrassment; it might become known and give rise to justified suspicions of the Empress, after she had accepted the part of mediator. (F. F. Martens, X, pp. 323–4 (Ostermann's memorandum of his conversation with Harris, July 13, 1782). Cf. Fox, I, p. 334 ff. In the parliamentary debate of March 25, 1801, Fox's offer to make the principles of the armed neutrality the basis of a treaty with Russia, was challenged by Pitt. Mr. Pitt stated that Mr. Fox advised His Majesty to cede these rights in behalf of the Empress of Russia for the purpose of purchasing her friendship, and preventing that sovereign from joining France with whom England was at war. Mr. Fox replied: ". . . I certainly did. . . . I applied here directly to M. Simolin, the Russian minister at this court, and with him endeavored to accomplish the negotiation. To him I offered a quid pro quo; and meant to give nothing without getting a full equivalent. . . ." Piggott and Omond, p. 237; Cf. Hansard, XXXV, col. 11277; Russell, Life of Fox, I, p. 300.)

In the meantime Fox left the foreign office. The head of the new cabinet, Lord Shelbourne, assured Simolin that in spite of all the prejudice of public opinion concerning the principles of the armed neutrality, the Court of London was disposed to sign a formal recognition. Apart from this, Simolin was convinced that the English Government was firmly resolved to continue in practice the application of the principles of the armed neutrality. (F. F. Martens, X, p. 324, Simolin's report of June 28–July 9, 1782.) In March, 1783, Fox came to the British foreign office once more, and consented to the mediation of Russia and Austria for the conclusion of the peace of Versailles, thus ending the ruinous war and recognizing the independence of the United States. In the meantime, in connection with the Crimea, the relations between Russia and Turkey became strained. The English Government supported Russia in Constantinople, once more attempting to conclude the alliance by promising the support of the English fleet in the Mediterranean. Catherine desired to take advantage of this support, but again refused to assume obligations toward England. Nevertheless, the English still entertained hopes for an Anglo-Russian agreement and supported the Russian policy in Constantinople. (F. F. Martens, X, pp. 325–6; Simolin's report, August 15–26, 1783; Simolin's report, November 8–19, 1783; Simolin's report, September 22–October 3, 1783; Catherine's rescript to Simolin, January 23, 1784; Fox, II, pp. 129 ff, 139 f, 272 f.)

A brief summary would lead to the following conclusions:

During the whole period of the negotiations for an Anglo-Russian alliance, Russia was interested only during the first half of the period and only to the extent of acquiring the good will of England on the high seas in Russo-Turkish conflicts. During the earlier negotiations England steadfastly excluded a casus foederis against Turkey, and thus her only opportunity for conclusion of a much sought alliance was lost. When later England offered to meet Russia's terms, from the Russian viewpoint, an alliance with England was entirely unnecessary and undesirable.

Catherine's desire to play the rôle of mediator, her interest in Russian maritime development, the disfavor with which she regarded English practices upon the high seas at the expense of Russian and other neutral shipping, and her belief that England's attitude in Turco-Russian relations was inspired by a desire to deny Russia an outlet into the Black Sea and into the Mediterranean, led her to adopt an anti-English attitude.

The French took advantage of the situation and by their good offices in Constantinople for the settlement of Russo-Turkish differences, their cooperation with Russia in the question of the Bavarian succession, and by their acceptance of Catherine's mediation for the conclusion of peace, effected a rapprochement with Russia. Vergennes's activities at the time of the declaration of the armed neutrality and the formation of the league of neutrals, in contrast to those of England, resulted in the complete isolation of the latter.

The policy and the declaration of the armed neutrality were conceived by Catherine herself. They were directed against England with the twofold purpose of defeating her claim of dominion on the high seas, and reaffirming the principles of international law established by the treaty of Utrecht in 1713 and of Aix la Chapelle in 1748, which England had persistently violated, treating them as special arrangements or exceptions of the established law of nations.

From the point of view of international law, the principles of the first armed neutrality, while not incorporated into a formal international act, were formally recognized by all states, with the exception of England, and applied in practice by all states, including England, and thus established a potent precedent which prevailed in the end.

The isolation of England and the policy of the first armed neutrality effected by Catherine were, in combination, one of the main factors in the outcome of the war of American independence. The Russian refusals both to conclude an alliance and to assist England in America greatly contributed to the success of the military operations against England. The English proposals of an alliance with Russia in exchange for a formal recognition of the principles of the armed neutrality having failed, England was forced to make peace and recognize the independence of the American Colonies, and was prevented from attempting their reconquest.

SUPPLEMENTAL ARTICLE PREPARED BY DOCTOR CARUSI AND DOCTOR KOJOUHAROFF

For two centuries England has been the predominant sea power of the modern world. Her armed fleets have kept pace with her colonial and foreign commerce, and she has acquired and retained a large part of the carrying trade of the seven seas. Her armed vessels have been used to protect her sea-borne commerce and to capture the merchant ships of enemy countries and increase her own tonnage by their condemnation to the use of the Crown. To these acts of war no legitimate complaint can be made, even where, as in the case of war against Holland, the sole purpose of the war was to destroy the competition for the carrying trade of neutrals.

There has, however, been uniform and unending complaint when, as a belligerent, the British Crown has claimed, as one of its prerogatives, the obscurely defined and practically unlimited right to lay the hand of violence upon neutral shipping, bring it into specially constituted Crown courts administering a special and exclusively British sea law, and by the inevitable condemnation of neutral ships as lawful prize, to aggrandize British trade and naval tonnage at the expense of nonwarring countries.

Of course, these practices, which have only been tolerated as a concession to vis major, have been defended by England as having a sound juridical basis. By entitling the Crown agency, which condemns the ship captured by another Crown agency, a court of justice, and an international court of justice at that, by using the jargon of the common law courts, and characterizing the proceeding as one in rem, by designating the neutral as plaintiff and the Crown as defendant it has sought to bring its prize courts under the rule of international comity, which requires one sovereign to stand helplessly by while the rights of its nationals are being decided by a competent court of justice.

The argument is that if an American, for instance, brings himself or his property within the jurisdiction of the courts of a foreign country, comity requires that diplomatic intercession or intervention shall be postponed until the final judgment of such court, and even thereafter shall be limited to cases where prima facie there has been a denial of justice.

An American or other neutral ship in the custody of the marshal of the prize court is, it is claimed, a res within the jurisdiction of the prize court. An opportunity is offered to the American owner to submit himself to the jurisdiction of the court by appearing as a claimant. If he loses his case, he has at least had his day in court. What more should one civilized state ask of another with respect to its nationals or their property within the territorial jurisdiction of another country? If it is claimed that the res in this case was not property carried voluntarily by a neutral into the territory of the British sovereign, but is there by reason of unlawful capture upon the high seas and the ocean highways of the world the ground is shifted, and we are told that under international law the prize court is alone competent to decide the question as to whether the res is or is not lawful prize.

Suspicion of unneutrality, which at one time justified visitation and search, to be followed by seizure only if probable cause existed, has been superseded by the unlimited right of capture, and after the ship is in the physical custody of the British prize court, the plaintiff neutral, after furnishing security for costs, may, if he can, establish to the satisfaction of a Crown agent, miscalled a judge, that the ship belongs to a neutral and that the voyage was innocent. Upon failure to sustain this burden, the Crown appointee must adjudicate the ownership of the res to the Crown. The opportunity to sustain the burden of proof is illusory.

All enemy ports are blockaded, not by ships of war but by royal edict styled "order in council." All merchandise is now contraband. It will not serve the neutral to prove a neutral port as destination. The doctrine of continuous voyage has been stretched to such limits that a mere suspicion by the Crown agent, sitting as president of a prize court, that by some possibility merchandise may be reexported to an enemy country, will justify a judgment of condemnation.

Pleadings were abolished in the prize courts, of which England established 44 in different parts of the world during the Great War. The plaintiff (the neutral) had, of course, to file his claim with all due particularity, but the procurator general, another agent of the Crown, need not disclose his hand. The presumption is in favor of the guilt of the ships and of the goods. By order in council the claimant may, at the discretion of the president of the court, be required to produce all documents relating not only to the voyage and the goods carried but as to his entire trade during the whole period of the war, and for as long a period prior to the war as the court may direct. The record is then searched for suspicious circumstances, and rare indeed is the case when the failure to discover one such is permitted to deprive the captor of his booty. The Swedish Government having made it a penal offense to communicate to any foreigner the trade secrets of a Swedish subject, one such neutral found himself in a peculiar dilemma before the London prize court. His ship was condemned for noncompliance with the order of discovery.

To all of this the British apologists answer that the prize court should not be judged by comparison with the regular municipal courts of England; that the prize court, while established under municipal law, is an international court in that it administers the law of nations. Upon examination this turns out to mean that if there be no act of Parliament on the particular matter, and no order of His Most Excellent Majesty the King in council, issued under his royal prerogative, and no antecedent decision of English prize courts, which by the rule of stare decisis the court considers itself bound to follow, recourse may be had to such conventions as have been made and ratified, or to the customary law of nations founded upon justice and reason.

As to conventional law of a general character, the armed neutrality is regarded as obsolete, the declaration of Paris too vague to be of value, the treaty of London was not ratified, and The Hague convention inoperative, or at least not binding on account of the so-called consolidation clause. It is true England signed a declaration that its articles were a correct statement of international law, but this was considered binding only where the statement coincided with principles of preexisting international law as recognized by British prize court decisions. Acts of Parliament play but little part, since the British wisely leave the Crown to deal with the rights of neutrals according to his discretion and in accordance with his bounty as administered by the prize claims commission.

The body of alleged international law administered by the prize courts boils down to the case law as extended and applied to meet new conditions. The London prize court has laid down the rule that new conditions of warfare may be considered as ground for departing from precedents where national policy required it, but changing conditions in business and commercial methods must be ignored, for, as said by Sir Samuel Evans, president of the London prize court, merchants must adapt their methods to meet prize law, and not prize law to square with modern business methods.

The case law of prizes has this in common with the case law of the regular law courts: It represents judicial legislation. In the case of the former the process was long, uninterrupted, and participated in by many judicial officers. The English price case law is the work of a single individual, Sir William Scott, afterwards Lord Stowell. During the Napoleonic wars, in which all Europe was embroiled, France and England preyed without restraint upon the neutral commerce of the world. One act of retaliation was followed by another and none but belligerents had rights on the high seas. Blockade or no blockade, neutrals were forbidden to trade with France, and by France forbidden, under pain of capture, to trade with the enemies of France.

In this favorable atmosphere Lord Stowell evolved the British prize law and announced it as the law of nations. In the World War international law meant, in an English prize court, Stowell's decisions enlarged and extended to meet new conditions of warfare and retaliatory measures.

So much is necessary to be understood to grasp the full significance of the protests of the American State Department during the World War. In reply to representations made by the American ambassador at London (see special supplement to Ninth American Journal of International Law, July, 1915, pp. 65 ff.) on February 10, 1915, Sir Edward Grey asserted the principle, "when an effective mode of redress is open to them in the courts of a civilized country by which they can obtain adequate satisfaction for any invasion of their rights which is contrary to the law of nations, the only course which is consistent with sound principle is that they should be referred to that mode of redress, and that no diplomatic action should be taken until other legal remedies have been exhausted and they are in a position to show prima facie denial of justice."

Just how effective a mode of redress is offered by a British prize court is sufficiently indicated by what has gone before. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that in a note of July 14, 1915 (see Ninth American Journal of International Law, July, 1915, p. 153) the Secretary of State directed Mr. Page to inform the British Government that, in so far as the interests of American citizens are concerned, the Government of the United States will insist upon their rights under the principles and rules of international law "without limitation or impairment by orders in council or other municipal legislation by the British Government, and will not recognize the validity of prize court proceedings taken under restraints imposed by British municipal law in derogation of the rights of American citizens under international law."

We took the position, therefore, that diplomatic intervention was justifiable, but, of course, diplomatic intervention means that the American Government was prepared to espouse the cause of its citizens whose rights as neutrals were being uniformly violated. Diplomatic intervention gathers its whole force and effect from the willingness and power of the country so intervening to force a recognition of its rights. If, however, that country has entered into obligation that it will never resort to war to enforce its rights as a nation or to support the rights of its citizens, or, in other words, that it renounces war except as a measure of self-defense against a military attack made upon it as a government, the rights of American neutrals are irrevocably gone when the Kellogg peace treaty is signed without suitable reservations.

TREATY OF UTRECHT, 1713

The treaties which accompanied or followed the peace of Utrecht in 1713 between Great Britain and France contained in Paragraph XVII are as follows: "And as it is now stipulated concerning ships and goods that free ships shall also give a freedom to goods; and that everything shall be deemed to be free and exempt which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the subjects of either of the confederates, although the whole lading or any part thereof should appertain to the enemies of either of their majesties, contraband goods being always excepted, on the discovery whereof matters shall be managed."

FIRST ARMED NEUTRALITY, 1780

The substance of the declaration of the first armed neutrality of 1780 was as follows: (i) Neutral vessels may freely navigate from port to port and along the coasts of nations at war; (ii) the goods belonging to subjects of powers at war shall be free on board neutral vessels, with the exception of contraband merchandise; (iii) as to the specification of contraband, the Empress held to what is expressed in the 10 and 12 articles of her treaty of commerce with Great Britain, extending its application to all powers at war; (iv) the designation of blockaded port shall apply only to a port where an attacking power has stationed its vessels sufficiently near and in such a way as to render access thereto clearly dangerous; (v) these principles shall serve as a rule of procedure and of judgment as to legality of process.

TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND PRUSSIA, 1785

The treaty between the United States and Prussia of 1785 is the most important treaty for its stipulations regarding neutrality. This treaty was largely the work of Franklin, who succeeded in inserting in it the important principles of neutrality, the regulations against privateering, and the immunity of private property. It was agreed that "all persons belonging to any vessel of war, public or private, who shall molest or injure * * * the people, vessels, or effects of the other party shall be responsible * * * for damages, * * *" and that "neither of the contracting parties shall grant or issue any commission to any private armed vessels empowering them to take or destroy such trading vessels, or interrupt such commerce." The treaty set forth definitely the duty of a neutral state not to give succor to belligerents. In addition to this, the treaty guaranteed the freedom of neutral commerce by accepting the principle that the flag covers the cargo.

Franklin's advanced ideas for the exemption of private property and the abolition of privateering were not appreciated by his contemporaries, who referred to them as a "beautiful abstraction, a dream of the philosopher who vainly sought to mitigate the cruelties of war." Modern international law, however, has adopted the immunity of private property in war on land, and attempts are made that it be adopted also in maritime warfare.

PROVISIONS OF THE DECLARATION OF PARIS, APRIL 16, 1856

1. Privateering is and remains abolished.

2. The neutral flag covers enemy merchandise with the exception of contraband of war.

3. Neutral merchandise, with the exception of contraband of war, is not seizable under the flag of the enemy.

4. Blockades, in order to be obligatory, should be effective; that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient to interdict actually access to the shore of the enemy.

It was decided that the declaration should be brought to the knowledge of the powers which did not take part in the Congress of Paris, and they be invited to accede to it.

The declaration was signed by Austria, France, Great Britain, Prussia, Russia, Sardinia, and Turkey.

Previous to the formal declaration, at the outbreak of the Crimean War, France and England made a declaration as to the treatment to be accorded neutral vessels during the war, acknowledging the principle "free ships, free goods." In connection with this declaration the Secretary of State, Marcy, sent a formal acknowledgment expressing the President's satisfaction that free ships make for free goods, which the United States has so long and so strenuously contended for as a neutral right. Marcy stated further that the gratification at the declaration would have been enhanced if Great Britain had announced that she would observe it in every future war. Unconditional sanction, Marcy said, would cause it to be recognized throughout the world as a general principle of international law.

When, in 1856, the formal declaration was signed a rigorous condition attached to adherence that all the four principles must be accepted as one and individual. Spain, Mexico, and Venezuela did not adhere to the declaration, declining to accept the abolition of privateering. Something similar was the position of the United States so far as a formal accession to the declaration is concerned. In a second note Secretary Marcy stated that the making the four principles indivisible prevented nations to subscribe to the principles of freedom of navigation because of the abolition of privateering—too great a sacrifice for nations as the United States to make, privateers being their main weapon of defense on the seas.

At the outbreak of the American Civil War Secretary Seward offered the adhesion of the United States to the declaration, accepting the abolition of privateering under the condition that a provision be accepted recognizing the immunity from seizure of private property on the high seas. The negotiations came to nothing, and formally the United States did not adhere to the declaration.

UNITED STATES AND IMMUNITY OF PRIVATE PROPERTY

At The Hague conference, 1899, the United States delegates, in accordance with specific instructions from their Government, presented the following proposition:

"The private property of all citizens or subjects of the signatory powers, with the exception of contraband of war, shall be exempt from capture or seizure on the high seas or elsewhere by the armed vessels or the military forces of any of the said signatory powers. But nothing herein contained shall extend exemption from seizure to vessels and their cargoes which may attempt to enter a port blockaded by the naval forces of any of the said powers."

This proposition represents a traditional policy of the United States. As long ago as 1783 Benjamin Franklin, in the course of treaty negotiations with Great Britain, expressed himself as follows:

"It is for the interest of humanity in general that the occasions of war and the inducements to it should be diminished. If rapine is abolished, one of the encouragements to war is taken away, and peace therefore more likely to continue and be lasting. The practice of robbing merchants on the high seas, a remnant of the ancient piracy, though it may be accidently beneficial to particular persons, is far from being profitable to all engaged in it or to the nation that authorizes it."

In his message of December, 1854, President Pierce referred to then pending suggestions on the subject in the following terms:

"The proposal to surrender the right to employ privateers is professedly founded upon the principle that private property of unoffending noncombatants, though enemies, should be exempt from the ravages of war; but the proposed surrender goes but little way in carrying out that principle, which equally requires that such private property should not be seized or molested by national ships of war. Should the leading powers of Europe concur in proposing, as a rule of international law, to exempt private property upon the ocean from seizure by public armed cruisers as well as by privateers, the United States will readily meet them upon that broad ground."

The refusal of the United States Government to sign the declaration of Paris, it is well known, was a consequence of the refusal of the powers to agree to this proposal.

In his message of December, 1898, President McKinley again asserted the American doctrine on the subject in the following passage:

"The experiences of the last year bring forcibly home to us a sense of the burdens and the waste of war. We desire, in common with most civilized nations, to reduce to the lowest possible point the damage sustained in time of war by peaceful trade and commerce. It is true, we may suffer in such cases less than other communities, but all nations are damaged more or less by the state of uneasiness and apprehension into which an outbreak of hostilities throws the entire commercial world.

"It should be our object, therefore, to minimize, so far as practicable, this inevitable loss and disturbance. This purpose can probably best be accomplished by an international agreement to regard all private property at sea as exempt from capture or destruction by the forces of belligerent powers. The United States Government has for many years advocated this humane and beneficent principle, and is now in a position to recommend it to other powers without the imputation of selfish motives. I therefore suggest for your consideration that the Executive be authorized to correspond with the governments of the principal maritime powers, with a view of incorporating into the permanent law of civilized nations the principle of the exemption of all private property at sea, not contraband of war, from capture or destruction by belligerent powers."

Resolutions were introduced in both Houses of Congress indorsing this recommendation. The shortness of the session, however, prevented final action on the resolutions, "but the sentiment which was developed was overwhelming in favor of adopting the rule of exemption, under proper restrictions, as to contraband and blockade. Congress at the same session passed the naval personal bill, which abolished prize money, thus removing one of the strongest incentives for capture of private property, and eliminating all questions as to the rights of seamen and officers."

CONTRABAND OF WAR

On account of the arbitrary origin of the practice of contraband of war (imposed and defined by the belligerents themselves in each case), no positive percept of international law concerning contraband is in existence. Much difference of opinion exists also among writers on international law as to contraband. Therefore the inference is that the notion of contraband does not admit precision. The prohibition of contraband is founded upon a most wide interpretation of noninterposition of neutrals in the war between belligerents. Belligerents have usurped the privilege of determining whether such interposition exists or not in each case by their treatment of goods as contraband. Such being the case, if the notion of contraband is incapable of definition, it is based on no principle at all and therefore is not suitable to form the basis of law. Under modern conditions, if the notion of contraband be admitted, there would be no escape from the abuses of the belligerents in treating everything as contraband of war.

The past experience with the notion of contraband has been such that modern jurists insist upon its abolition, because restricting rules would not remedy the situation, and because under modern conditions prohibition of contraband is no longer a measure of self-defense; it affects neutrals and the civilian populations more than it contributes to the outcome of wars.

Practically all international treaties have limited contraband of war to arms and ammunitions, and as soon as wars broke out the treaties have been disregarded by belligerents, and the lists of contraband articles extended according to circumstances, resulting in inhuman warfare and subjecting neutral trade to severe treatment.

An instance of abolition of contraband is contained in the treaty between the United States and Prussia of 1785. This treaty provides that arms and war material were not to be confiscated, but only detained for certain period of time, subject to compensation of the loss occasioned to the private owner of the goods so detained. This provision was renewed in 1799.

BLOCKADE

There is no agreement among authors as to the principle upon which the right of blockade exists. The prevailing view is that the blockade is an attempt to reduce an enemy to subjection and therefore is a legitimate form of warfare. Nevertheless, past experience shows that from a form of warfare, blockades have been transformed into weapons against neutral trade. Such abuses were practiced even during the Great War, in spite of the fact that international law expressedly forbade "paper blockades," that is, blockades which were not actually maintained, but only proclaimed by belligerents in order to plunder neutral commerce. Another abuse of the right of blockade is the blockading of whole countries or prohibition of all trade with the enemy.

Deprived of its character of a naval operation, a blockade has no reason of existence, therefore, an attempt should be made to define the law of blockade in such a fashion as to exclude its abuse in the future.

BRITISH BLOCKADE OF GERMANY, 1915

At the beginning of February, 1915, the German Government issued a decree, as an answer to Great Britain's exclusion of foodstuffs from Germany, declaring the waters round the British Isles a "war area" from February 18, and threatening after that date to destroy every enemy merchant ship found in that area without its always being possible to avert the consequent peril to persons and cargoes and neutral shipping. In reply to this an order in council was published on March 11, whereby it was declared to be the intention of the British Government to divert all ships trafficking with Germany, and to take them into port, though without confiscating either ship or cargo, save where they would otherwise be liable to confiscation. In this order in council the words "blockade" and "contraband" and other technical terms of international law were purposely omitted because, as the Prime Minister said, "in dealing with an opponent who has openly repudiated all the principles both of law and humanity," Great Britain and her allies were not going to allow their efforts "to be strangled in a network of juridical niceties." The actual effect of the order in council was to establish a rigorous blockade of Germany.

POINTS TO BE SETTLED BY AN INTERNATIONAL TREATY

1. Definition of the rights and duties of neutrals and belligerents.
2. Immunity of private property on the high seas.
3. Immunity of the neutral flag on the high seas.
4. Restriction of blockades, and definite rules governing them.
5. Abolition of the contraband of war, or at least its strict limitation to manufactured arms and ammunitions; express stipulations that foodstuffs be excluded under any circumstances.
6. Adoption of international prize law and procedure, settling all questions so as to prevent nations under different excuses returning to their old doctrines.
7. Establishment of an international prize court (if not of first instance, at least of appeals).
8. Strict definition of the right of "retaliation" and "reprisals," in order to avoid nations evading international obligations under such excuses.
9. Strict definition of the right of visit and search of neutral ships. (If contraband is abolished, visit and search should also be abandoned.)
10. Definition of the right of capture of neutral ships on the high seas and bringing them in belligerent ports for adjudication; definition of conditions under which neutral ships could be subjected to such treatment; provision for indemnification of the loss occasioned to ship and cargo.

CONSOLATO AND FREE SHIPS DOCTRINES

According to the rule of the Consolato del Mare, an enemy's goods were subject to confiscation, while a friend's goods were free, even though found in an enemy's vessel. The main object was to seize the goods of an enemy upon the high seas and to respect the property of a friend, whatever the character of the carrier. Neutral ships and neutral goods were spared, while belligerent ships and belligerent goods were liable to capture. The acceptance of the Consolato del Mare by European maritime powers was far from general. The individual interests of each state at each period were the main guide in their practice. The Dutch, the chief carriers of the world during the sixteenth century, whose obvious interest was therefore in obtaining the immunity of the goods carried in neutral bottoms, persistently endeavored to diminish the severity of belligerent practice. In opposition to the Consolato, they introduced a new principle that "free ships make free goods." This principle was introduced in 12 treaties with other powers during the period from 1650 to 1700. (Rhee, p. 5 f; Treaties in Dumont, Vol. XIII, p. 50; Treaty with England, 1667, 1674, ibid., p. 253; 1674, ibid., p. 282; with France, 1661, Vol. XII, p. 346; 1662, Vol. XII, p. 412; 1678, Vol. XIII, p. 350; with Portugal, 1661, Vol. XII, p. 366; with Spain, 1675, Vol. XIII, 285; with Sweden, 1667, Vol. XIII, p. 39.)

During the Middle Ages, when political communities were in a chaotic state, international relations were very limited. Even in times of peace the rights and property of foreigners were practically unprotected. Several centuries elapsed before governments became independent political bodies. Governments having established their power on land met with more difficulty in repressing anarchy and in maintaining the authority of law at sea. During the feudal régime piracy was carried on by companies as a sort of honorable business and opposed every attempt aiming to deprive them of it. Government's having no navies could not afford protection to navigation, and the greatest violence pervaded every sea. Pirates were their own legislators and judges in all questions relating to prize.

Under such conditions merchants were unable to undertake voyages alone and formed associations for mutual protection. The desire for plunder induced many enterprising men to engage in such pursuits, but traversing the seas without the restraint of law they also acquired the habit of plunder. Such was the insecurity on the seas in time of peace. In time of war every individual was allowed to fit ships, capture prizes, and dispose of them at pleasure. Governments encouraged freebooters as chief instruments of warfare on the high seas. Corsairs, however, could scarcely be distinguished from piratical bands. Belligerents, impelled by a desire to prohibt all commerce with the enemy, sanctioned these proceedings.

Thus in the Consolato del Mare, a compilation of the Middle Ages, we see reflected the anarchical mode of carrying on maritime warfare. Corsairs were released from all responsibility and allowed to plunder at will; therefore it was useless to prescribe laws. Under the circumstances the rules laid down in the Consolato were the first attempt, at least, to save neutral property from corsairs. But that was all; neutrals were left in the hands of the commander of the corsairs, over whom no surveillance was exercised; he decided the fate of the ship, and from his decision there was no appeal. The inefficiency of the rules of the Consolato is attested by historical facts; that compilation was the self-legislation of merchants, but not of any political authority and much less of international society.

The plunder of corsairs assumed such proportions that they became a menace to the navigation of their own countrymen, and therefore governments found it necessary to put restraint upon the independence of corsairs. Thus, by the end of the Middle Ages, the authority of the royal admiral was extended over every vessel, and in the maritime towns prize courts were established. In this way, at the close of the fifteenth century maritime wars gradually assumed a different phase. Instead of corsairs, privateers were established under the authority of government and controlled by prize courts. Since that time all prize causes have been adjudged in prize courts. Independent nations, however, did not submit unconditionally to this jurisdiction of the belligerents. Already at the end of the fifteenth century we find clauses in treaties in which neutral governments adopt measures for the protection of their subjects against partiality in prize courts and make provision against procrastination.

Up to the end of the sixteenth century the measures against piracy appeared sufficient. The idea of neutrality, however, was but imperfectly understood and hardly recognized in public opinion. Neutral commerce had not as yet excited such general interest or given occasion to such disputes amongst nations as it has done since. On the other hand, privateers, being the chief if not the only organs of maritime warfare, directed their efforts principally against the enemy.

At the beginning of the seventeenth century a gradual change took place in maritime warfare. With the establishment of fleets on an extended scale, privateers no longer served as necessary auxiliaries in naval operations. Now they began to direct their attacks against neutral commerce, which had now attained larger proportions. Mercantile motives prompted governments to encourage expeditions against foreign merchants, promising to privateers the whole of seized property. This resulted in intricate prize procedure, and maritime warfare, in which belligerents alone were formerly concerned, produced consequences injurious to the commerce of the world at large.

Privateers made navigation impossible; prize courts condemned ships and cargoes under most trifling breaches of belligerent decrees. To protect themselves from such arbitrary attacks, neutrals were forced into a struggle with the maritime powers. The result was that at the beginning of the eighteenth century neutrals succeeded in modifying some of the severities of prize procedure and in introducing new principles. The freedom of the neutral flag was acknowledged in almost all the treaties of the seventeenth century and confirmed by the principal European powers in the treaties of Utrecht (1713).

FREE SHIPS, TREATIES, SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

In conventions after 1612 the Netherlands and France tried to make 'free ships, free goods" a principle of international law. England opposed them, wishing to apply it only as a special privilege to some nations, while she held to her old practice elsewhere. (Gessner, p. 36.) The English practice, however, could not be considered as customary law of nations, and under the European system established by the treaty of Westphalia every rule claiming international standing required the consent of all nations; that is, implied convention. The conventions of the period previous to the treaty of Utrecht show a constant tendency toward the adoption of the principle "free ships, free goods."

As early as 1646 the Dutch obtained from France a suspension of the French ordinance and the concession of the principle "free ships, free goods." (Wheaton, History, p. 123 f; Flassan, III, p. 451; Cauchy, II, p. 176; Hautefeuille, II, p. 297.) In 1654, in her treaty with Portugal, England conceded the principle of free ships. (Jenkinson, Discourse, p. 48; Cauchy, II, p. 175; Wheaton, History, p. 121.) In 1655 a treaty between France and the Hansa renewed the privileges of the latter and conceded the principle of free ships. (Flassan, III, p. 194; Ortolan, I, pp. 123, 129; Wheaton, History, p. 124.) In 1658 the Dutch obtained from France a repeal of the French ordinance and concession of the principle of free ships. (Dumont, VI, pt. I.) In 1659, the treaty of the Pyrenees between France and Spain recognized the principle of free ships, free goods. (Hautefeuille, II, p. 296 f; Wheaton, History, 120 f.)

The treaty of 1663 between France and Denmark stipulates the principle "free ships, free goods; and enemy ships, enemy goods." (Flassan, III, p. 395; Wheaton, Hist., p. 124; Gessner, p. 35.) The treaty of 1667 between Great Britain and Spain refers in general to the rights of neutrals to trade with the enemy. (Wheaton, Hist., p. 121; Cauchy, II, p. 175; Jenkinson, p. 48; Ortolan, II, p. 129.) A treaty of the same year between France and England stipulates "free ships, free goods." (Gessner, p. 35; Reddie, I, p. 266.) In the treaty of 1668 Great Britain conceded to Holland the principle of "free ships, free goods." (Wheaton, Hist., p. 124; Jenkinson, p. 67 ff; Cauchey, II, p. 177.) The treaty of 1672 between France and Sweden adopted the same principle with the addition "enemy ships, enemy goods." (Flassan, III, p. 395; Wheaton, Hist., p. 124; Gessner, p. 35.)

In 1674 Great Britain renewed her treaty with Holland confirming the principle, "free ships, free goods." (Wheaton, Hist., p. 122 f; Cauchy, II, pp. 175, 177.) The treaty of 1677 between France and Great Britain adopted the doctrine, "free ships, free goods; enemy ships, enemy goods." (Flasan, III, p. 423; Wheaton, Hist., p. 121 f; Cauchy, II, p. 175.) In 1678, the peace of Nimiguen, the French conceded to Holland the principle of "free ships, free goods." (Wheaton, Hist., p. 123 f; Cauchy, II, p. 176; Hautefeuile, II, p. 297.) The same concession was confirmed in 1697 by the treaty of Ryswick. (Wheaton, Hist., p. 124; Flassan, III, p. 451.)

FRANCE—TREATIES

France followed the example of the Dutch. By the treaty of the Pyrenees in 1659 the rule, "free ships, free goods; enemy ships, enemy goods," was agreed to by France and Spain. (Dumont, VI, pt. xi, p. 267.) This new principle was renewed by the treaty of 1739 with the united provinces (Wenck, V, p. 424), in 1742 with Denmark (ibid., I, p. 621), in 1748 with England and Spain by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, and in 1763 with the same powers by the treaty of Paris (Wheaton, Hist. of the Law of Nations, pp. 120–125), in 1774 with Mechlenbourg-Schwerin (ibid., II, p. 709), in 1778 with the United States of America (De Martens, Rec., I, p. 39), in 1783 with England and Spain (ibid., III, p. 439), in 1785 with the united provinces (ibid., IV, p. 68), in 1786 with England (ibid., IV, p. 168), in 1787 with Russia (ibid., IV, p. 210), and in 1789 with Hamburg (ibid., IV, p. 426). France reverted to the old rule in 1793 and declared enemy goods on neutral vessels to be lawful prize, the neutral ship, however, being released and freight paid by the captors (ibid., V, p. 382). This policy was again enforced in 1797 by a similar declaration (ibid., V, p. 393). With the nineteenth century France returned to the new principle, and in the treaty of 1800 with the United States once more agreed to the rule, "Free ships, free goods; enemy ships, enemy goods." (Atherly-Jones, p. 286 ff; Martens, Rec., VI, p. 186.)

The war between the Netherlands and Spain opens a new period in the history of privateering. Belligerents renounced the observance of the Consolato del Mare and began to issue arbitrary decrees against neutrals, and the number of privateers increased considerably. Having destroyed Spanish trade, Dutch privateers degenerated into pirates. Instead of adopting measures to meet this system of plunder, by her decrees Holland augmented the difficulties of European trade. The other belligerents issued decrees of equal severity. Thus privateering became a regular institution in Europe. The object of belligerent decrees was to encourage privateers at the expense of neutrals. Relying on their power, regardless of principle, and influenced by mercenary motives, belligerents considered only their own interests.

The treaties of the seventeenth century represent a considerable similarity. The acknowledgment of the immunity of the flag, the limiting of blockade, and the definition of contraband of war show that the principle of neutrality was sufficiently understood. But these principles were admitted by special treaties to a few favored nations. Neutral navigation remained in a subordinate position because the great naval powers were usually found amongst the belligerents. Neutrals lacked unity, and thus belligerents stood in no fear of strong opposition.

The first attempt of opposition was made by Sweden and Denmark during the war of 1689–1697, when England and Holland forbade intercourse with France. Sweden and Denmark armed a fleet for the protection of their trade and soon attained their object—belligerents found it more prudent to abandon their decrees.

At the beginning of the eighteenth century, when the war spread all over Europe, abuses revived, treaties were disregarded and replaced by harsh decrees. Neutral trade found no support and suffered enormously from the violence of privateers and the malpractices of prize courts. The treaty of Utrecht put an end to this wretched state of affairs; the principles of neutrality proclaimed during the seventeenth century, but violated during the war of Spanish succession, were sanctioned by the principal maritime powers of Europe.

TREATY OF UTRECHT, 1713

The more dangerous the practice of belligerents on the seas became to neutral navigation the more civilized nations exerted themselves to establish the immunity of the neutral flag. The treaties of Utrecht, which were understood to establish the basis of public international law and international relations, and which were constantly renewed and confirmed, established the principle that the flag covers the cargo. (Wheaton, p. 88; Katchennovsky, p. 43; Ortolan, II, p. 122 f; Hautefeuille, p. 296 f.; Treaties of Great Britain and France: Chalmers, I, p. 402; Dumont, VIII, pt. 1, p. 345; France and Holland: Dumont, VIII, pt. 1, p. 409; Great Britain and Spain: Reddie, I, p. 271.) Thus was the question about flag and cargo settled, by receding from the system of the Consolato del Mare. The neutral nations, however, were far from having put a stop to all the malpractices of the belligerents. The belligerents considered themselves quite independent with reference to everything relating to the constitution of their own admiralty courts. (Katchenovsky, p. 44; Gessner, p. 35. The English dispute the view that the treaties of Utrecht established the principle free ships, free goods, as international law. Reddie, I, p. 271, says that the very fact that it was inserted in the treaties proves that it was not recognized as common consuetudinary law of nations. Reddie's argument is an unsuccessful paradox.)

At the conclusion of the treaty of Utrecht (1713) what were its conditions as to the rights of neutrals? England emerged as the dominant maritime power and adopted a policy of maintaining her supremacy on the seas by retaining a monopoly in the carrying trade of the world. In her attempts to maintain her supremacy on the seas and to build her Empire, England became involved in wars which threatened her monopoly in the carrying trade. So long as the carrying trade was the main source of naval power, England was determined not to allow neutrals to overtake her in maritime development while she was engaged in war and was unable to take care of the sea traffic. Thus, as soon as war broke out, England violated the provisions of the treaties of Utrecht and became a most dangerous opponent to neutral trade and navigation by attempting to impose on the world medieval conceptions of international maritime law and by arbitrary seizures and condemnations.

In the maritime war of 1739 between England and Spain, France and Holland also took part, and consequently the position of neutrals at once became precarious. While all belligerents resorted to harsh practices, now the conduct of England was outstanding. She encouraged her privateers at the expense of other nations, and in order to prevent neutrals from obtaining advantages while she was engaged in war she obstinately adhered to the medieval system of Consolato del Mare and tried to impose it upon all nations; the principles of neutrality contained in the treaties of the seventeenth century were regarded as dangerous innovations, contravening the purposes of English domination of the seas, and therefore disregarded. It is noteworthy that after the treaties of Utrecht the European powers were inclined to adopt the principles of the immunity of the flag as such of general international law, and it was England's opposition which prevented this from being accomplished. Therefore, the abuses on the high seas during the war of 1739–1748 were due to English policy.

Neutrals condemned the English doctrine and practice, but were helpless to remedy it on account of England's preponderance on the seas. A case in which a neutral nation imposed upon England respect for neutral rights is the so-called controversy of the "Silesian loan" between England and Prussia. At the outbreak of the war of 1739, the King of Prussia addressed himself to the English Government for an explanation as to the principles which England was to follow concerning neutral trade. The reply was that Prussian trade was not to be interfered with, and that only arms and ammunition should be considered war contraband. As soon as Prussian merchants began to trade in French goods, however, the English seized and condemned their ships. Numerous complaints were addressed to the King of Prussia; the latter protested and England disregarded his protests. The King appointed a commission to investigate the facts and resolved to compensate his merchants out of the Silesian loan, the interest of which he was bound by treaty to pay to the English. Hence arose a serious controversy between Prussia and England. The Prussian commissioners upheld the principles of neutrality contained in the treaties and proclaiming the immunity of the flag, and stated further that the decision of the English prize court was not ipso jure binding on the King of Prussia, because the respective rights and duties of neutral merchants should be determined by mutual consent between the governments. Therefore, the King is entitled to claim damages from the belligerents, and failing to obtain them to have recourse to reprisals. The English attempted to refute the argument of the Prussian commissioners by basing their practice and prize jurisdiction upon "immemorial custom," but such arguments did not shake the opinion of the Prussian commissioners, who stated that England followed neither the old system nor the new, and that everything was manipulated in favor of privateers at the expense of neutrals. The controversy was terminated in 1756; England made compensation to the Prussian merchants and the King of Prussia removed the sequestration from the Silesian loan.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE (1748), PARIS (1763)

The treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) renews generally the treaties of Utrecht. As the treaties of navigation are not expressly mentioned in that of Aix-la-Chapelle, it might appear doubtful whether the stipulations of Utrecht in favor of neutral navigation were meant to be confirmed. This doubt was, however, entirely removed by the treaty of Paris (1763) between France, Great Britain, and Spain, to which Portugal acceded, which expressly renews and confirms the stipulations of Utrecht concerning neutral navigation. (Wheaton, Hist., p. 204; Ortolan, II, p. 132; Reddie, I, p. 273 f. Reddie says that the provisions concerning the freedom of neutral navigation "was neglected, or rather, by tacit acquiescence was voluntarily departed from by each of the contracting parties." The case is that England was responsible for the violation of the provision and that other belligerents applied the principle toward neutrals so far as possible under the circumstances. For the treaty of Paris (1763) see Martens, Recueil, I, p. 107.)

AMERICAN TREATIES—NEUTRALITY

The American Government had observed the British practice until 1784, when Congress issued an ordinance instructing the representatives abroad to follow the principles of the armed neutrality as a basis for treaty negotiations, if acknowledged reciprocally by other states. (Wharton, Dipl. Corres., VI, p. 801 f.) The treaty with France of 1778 (U. S. Stats. L, VIII, p. 20; cf. Rhee, p. 31) was based upon the principles embodied in the draft of 1776. Another important treaty based upon these principles is that of 1782 with Holland (Wharton, Treaties (1871), p. 610 f; U. S. Stats. L., VIII, p. 38; Rhee, p. 30 f.), providing for the free navigation of merchant ships between enemy ports, contraband excepted. The provisions of this treaty were embodied in that of 1783 with Sweden (Wharton, Treaties, p. 799; U. S. Stats. L, VIII, p. 68) as far as neutral trade was concerned and also in that with Prussia of 1785 (Wharton, Treaties, p. 715; renewal of 1799, Wharton, Treaties, p. 718 f; Martens, Suppl. II, p. 227; Stats. L., VIII, p. 168). In this renewal the United States abandoned the principle because "it made them the victims of their adherence to it while violated by their adversaries." (Dana's Wheaton, p. 593; cf. Amer. St. Paps., Vol. I, p. 251; Vol. IV, pp. 38, 47. Renewal of 1828, Stats. L., VIII, p. 384; cf. Rhee, pp. 32 ff, 54 ff.) It is not surprising to see that the weaker states, like the Netherlands, Sweden, and Morocco, agreed with the United States. But the fact that the greater powers, like France, Spain, as well as Great Britain, also accepted this principle by the treaties of Versailles in 1783 seems rather remarkable. (Wharton, Treaties, p. 588.) But no such stipulations were inserted in the treaty with Great Britain of 1794 (Wharton, Treaties, p. 329; Martens; Recueil, V, p. 672); she still held to her old practice.

AMERICAN TREATIES

In the treaty with France of 1800 (Martens, Recueil, VI, p. 186) the principle of "free ships, free goods," contraband of war excepted, was combined with the principle of "enemy ships, enemy goods." In the treaty with Sweden of 1816 (Martens, Recueil, VI, p. 240) and in the treaty with Spain of 1819 (ibid., VI, p. 262) it was declared that if either of the parties should be at war with a third party and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral should cover the property of enemies whose governments acknowledged this principle and not of others. In the treaty with Russia of 1854 (ibid., X, p. 215) neutral property in enemy ships, unless contraband of war, was declared not to be subject to confiscation, the principle being applicable to all powers as should consent to adopt it as permanent. These stipulations were repeated in the treaty with the Two Sicilies in 1855 (ibid., XI, p. 608), and with Peru in 1856 (ibid., XI, p. 696), and in the treaty with China in 1858 (ibid., XII, p. 77 (repealed in 1858, p. 183); cf. Atherly-Jones, p. 294 f).

The principles of free ships, free goods, and enemy ships, enemy goods, were combined in the following treaties: With Colombia of 1824 (Martens, Recueil, V, p. 310); with Central America of 1825 (ibid., V, p. 328); with Brazil of 1828 (ibid., V, p. 393); with Mexico of 1831 (ibid., V, p. 418); with Chile of 1832 (ibid., V, p. 436); with Venezuela of 1836 (ibid., V, p. 472); with Peru-Bolivia of 1836 (ibid., V, p. 490); with Ecuador of 1839 (ibid., V, p. 540); with New Grenada of 1846 (ibid., IX, p. 888); with Guatemala of 1849 (ibid., X, p. 7); with Peru of 1851 (ibid., X, p. 38); and with San Salvador of 1850 (ibid., X, p. 74); with Bolivia of 1858 (ibid., XII, p. 300), with the further stipulation that those on board a neutral ship, although enemies, were not to be taken out unless they were in the actual service of the enemy. The treaty of Venezuela in 1860 (ibid., XII, p. 215), the treaty with Haiti in 1864 (ibid., XIII, p. 719), and the treaties with the Dominican Republic in 1867 (ibid., XV, p. 481) and the Republics of Peru and San Salvador in 1870 (ibid., XVIII, pp. 707, 732), all repeat the stipulations of the treaty with Bolivia. In the treaty with Italy in 1871 (ibid., XVII, p. 853), it was stipulated that the flag of the neutral should cover the property of those enemies who acknowledged the principle. In the treaty of Peru, in 1887 (ibid., XXV, p. 1452), the former stipulation of enemy ships, enemy goods, was reversed, and it was agreed that the flag of the neutral should cover the property of those enemies who acknowledged the principle.

After the concession to Prussia, England continued her practice During the Seven Years' War she attacked the trade of the Dutch, in spite of the special treaty of 1674, which recognized the immunity of the Dutch flag expressedly. Moreover, after the outbreak of hostilities, the French opened their colonial trade to the Dutch. The English seized and condemned the ships of the Dutch, alleging that neutrals have no right to carry on in time of war a commerce which is not permitted them in time of peace, and that ships trading on account of the enemy have forfeited the immunity of their flag and can not be considered neutral. Thus originated the new rule of 1756. The northern powers also suffered from the malpractices of the belligerents, and in 1759 entered into a convention for the defense of their neutral rights; thus the Baltic was closed to privatéers. On the reestablishment of peace by the treaties of Paris and Hubertsberg, 1763, the provisions of the treaties of Utrecht concerning freedom of navigation were renewed.

In 1776 commenced the struggle between England and the United States. England returned to her old system and, taking advantage of the peculiar character of the war, attempted wholly to suppress neutral trade. The English prize court extended its doctrine of contraband and blockade to such extremities that finally, in 1780, under the leadership of Catherine, the first armed neutrality was proclaimed. It reasserted the principles of freedom of navigation, and forced England to yield to the powerful coalition; she mitigated, though not avowedly, the severity of her prize law so that toward the end of the war privateering had almost disappeared. (Conditions of Treaties of Armed Neutrality. See magazine article. See American treaties file.)

At the conference of Versailles the treaties of Utrecht were again renewed by England, France, and Spain; the freedom of navigation found support also in America. The powers of the first armed neutrality directed their efforts to develop the principles of 1780 in the treaties so as to lessen the possibility of England again returning to her extreme doctrines.

JAY TREATY, 1794

The action of the British assize courts and prize courts under the orders of November 6, 1793, caused great indignation in America. Petitions for redress poured into Congress, and retaliatory measures were urged. As a result, Jay was sent to England to seek indemnification for American goods and vessels confiscated under the claims that foodstuffs were contraband and for captures made in connection with blockades when they were not generally known to exist. (American State Papers, III, p. 472 ff.) A treaty was finally signed November 19, 1794 (Malloy, Treaties, I, p. 590 ff; Martens, V, p. 640), approved by President Washington, and ratified by the Senate, with the omission of the twelfth article. This article, though permitting trade between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies, prohibited American vessels from carrying certain articles to any part of the world except the United States; if the United States had consented to such restrictions, she would have lost much of the advantage she derived from her position as a neutral state. Great Britain acceded to the omission of this article, and ratifications were exchanged on October 28, 1795. (Updyke, p. 71 ff.) As to the exertions of the United States in favor of the immunity of the neutral flag, they remained unsuccessful. By the Jay treaty of 1794 both powers reverted to the principles of the Consolato del Mare and extended the catalogue of contraband to some articles "ambiguiusus." (Katchenovsky, p. 76.)

The continental governments, having agreed on the fundamental principles of prize jurisdiction, entertained the idea of drawing up a code of neutrality, but these intentions were frustrated by the outbreak of the French Revolution, which afforded a pretext to belligerents for resuming their former harsh proceedings; privateers and prize courts not only refused to acknowledge the immunity of the flag but even disavowed the old medieval doctrines. The efforts of the northern powers to form a permanent coalition did not succeed; the second armed neutrality of 1800 lasted only a few months. Thus during the French revolutionary wars the power of neutral governments diminished and England returned to the system of the Middle Ages without serious opposition. At the end of the eighteenth century the decisions of Sir William Scott (afterwards Lord Stowell), supported by the British Navy, were enforced on neutrals. The English Government, however, failed in attaining an absolute supremacy at sea. The expedient of retaliation was abused in an extreme manner; thus the very idea of neutrality was repudiated and prize courts transformed into instruments of a commercial inquisition.

It was this English prize law, created by Sir William Scott during the period of the French revolutionary wars, which the English have persisted ever since to enforce on neutrals, and did enforce it as late as during the Great War. It is the same law which the English repeatedly represented as international law. The manner in which this law originated and the doctrines on which it was built, being a patch-up work of the treatises of publicists upholding the supremacy of belligerents, deprive it of any international status at all. It was largely based also on orders in council, which were smuggled in under the excuse of retaliation.

During the French revolutionary wars the harshness of the English and French decrees was felt in most distant countries. Thus the United States after having for some time patiently borne the violence of belligerents determined to put an end to intercourse with Europe (March 1, 1809). A short time afterwards Napoleon relaxed his system, making an exception in favor of the United States. Anticipating reciprocity on the part of England, a number of American merchants dispatched ships to Europe, and almost all of them fell into the hands of English privateers, and in May, 1811, Sir William Scott condemned them. The English subsequently offered to annul the orders in council, but the offer came too late—war had been declared (1812).

CRIMEAN WAR

During the period 1814–1854 the establishment of the political system at the congress of Vienna opened a new period in the history of Europe—a period of peace. It resulted in the improvement of maritime law and the diffusion of the principles of the first armed neutrality. The only exception in favor of the consolato is the treaty of Great Britain with Portugal (1842). But this exception scarcely affords any reason to doubt the acceptance of the principles of 1780 as general international law, since no other government than that of Portugal renounced the immunity of its flag. Moreover, nations began to manifest inclinations to oppose English policy with strong measures, and therefore England herself began to incline toward a change of policy—the navigation act of Cromwell was repealed. At the outbreak of the Crimean War (March, 1854) the British and French declaration not only acknowledged the immunity of the flag but also the inviolability of the cargoes. Thus England yielded to civilized public opinion.

The principles of freedom of navigation were established also in America. All American statesmen from Jefferson to Webster maintained these principles. According to their opinion neutral nations are not bound to submit to the system of the consolato. It finds no support in the philosophy of law, and although it has been introduced in some treaties in fact it is upheld solely by the force of belligerents. Therefore in the treaties United States upheld the principle of freedom of navigation.

DECLARATION OF PARIS—HAGUE CONFERENCE

There was the declaration of Paris of 1856 which had become by formal accession or tacit acceptance by all the powers an established part of the general body of international law. Limited to the briefest statement of a few general principles regarding the immunity of goods from capture and as to what constitutes a lawful blockade, it laid down no tests to be applied in determining enemy character, or as to what constitutes contraband, or what rules shall be adopted in determining its liability to capture. Various matters in respect to blockade were left untouched by the declaration.

The first Hague conference did not occupy itself with the subject of maritime war and while the program of the second conference apparently contemplated the formulation of a maritime "code" to supplement the regulations concerning land warfare, the actual achievements were disappointing. A number of conventions were formulated and some of them were ratified but they were not comprehensive and they have been characterized as being "more remarkable for what they omitted than for what they settled" and that "in many cases where they professed to establish a rule, its value was whittled away by its vague statement." Among these conventions were those relative to the treatment of enemy merchant vessels in port at the outbreak of war, the conversion of merchant ships into war vessels, the adaption to maritime warfare of the principles of the Geneva convention, naval bombardments, certain restrictions upon the right of capture in naval warfare and the rights and duties of neutral powers in naval warfare. Some of them left unsettled important questions concerning the matters with which they dealt and none of them dealt with the subjects of blockade, contraband, visit and search, destruction of prizes, transfers of flag, and unneutral service. In the final act of the conference the vœu was expressed that "the preparation of regulations relative to the law and customs of naval war should figure on the program of the next conference and that in any case the powers might apply, as far as possible, to sea warfare, the principles of the convention relative to the laws and customs of war on land."

As is well known, the conference of 1899 adopted three conventions, three declarations, a resolution, and six vœux on different subjects. Convention III extends to maritime warfare the principles of the Geneva convention of 1864, and it likewise was ratified by or adhered to by all the belligerents in the late war.

The conference of 1907 adopted 13 conventions and 1 declaration. Convention VI, relating to the status of enemy merchant ships, has not been ratified by a considerable number of states, including Bulgaria, China, Greece, Italy, Montenegro, Serbia, Turkey, and the United States, all of whom were belligerents in the late war, and therefore, according to article 6 its provisions were not binding; the same was true of Convention VIII relative to the laying of automatic submarine contact mines; of Convention IX concerning naval bombardments; of Convention X for the adaptation to naval warfare of the principles of the Geneva convention; of Convention XI relative to certain restrictions upon the right of capture in naval warfare; and of Convention XII concerning the rights and duties of neutral powers in naval warfare. Great Britain has not ratified the convention for the adaptation of the principles of the Geneva convention to maritime warfare.

None of the acts of the conference of 1907 were legally binding on any of the belligerents during the late war. But the convention of 1899 respecting the laws and customs of war—of which the corresponding convention of 1907 is mainly a revision—having been ratified by all of them, was binding upon all; and so was the convention of 1899 for the adaptation of the principles of the Geneva convention to maritime warfare, of which the corresponding convention of 1907 is likewise a revision. As the conventions of 1907 respecting the laws and customs of war on land and for the adaptation of the principles of the Geneva convention to maritime war were merely revisions of the corresponding conventions of 1899, it seems to have been the intention of the conference of 1907 that the revised conventions should, when duly ratified, replace as between the contracting parties the earlier conventions, but that the latter should remain in force as between the powers which have ratified them, but which have not ratified the latter conventions. There would seem, therefore, of the binding effect of the conventions of 1899 in a war in which all the belligerents are parties to these conventions, as was the case in the recent war, The Hague reglement only specifies precisely the dispositions already admitted by all civilized nations without any dispute.

The question whether Convention VI of 1907 relating to the status of enemy merchant vessels at the outbreak of war was binding on the British prize court was considered at length by Sir Samuel Evans in the case of the Mowe, decided November 9, 1914. Although, strictly speaking, he said it was not clear that the convention was binding on the court, nevertheless, acting in pursuance of the authority conferred on him by the order in council establishing the prize courts and the commission issued to the judges to determine cases "according to the course of admiralty and the law of nations," he would direct that any alien enemy who claimed a right or an immunity under any of The Hague conventions should be allowed to appear and to argue his case before the court. Moreover, in determining the liability to capture of German merchant vessels in English ports, Sir Samuel Evans applied those articles of the convention which Germany had ratified without reservation, and he issued decrees of detention when he might have issued decrees of condemnation had he been disposed to regard the convention as not being force. On the other hand, he refused to accord German claimants the benefit of article 3 and paragraph 2 of article 4 of the said convention, which provide that merchant vessels encountered on the high seas in ignorance of the outbreak of hostilities and having left their last port of departure before the commencement of war, shall merely be detained until the war ends instead of being condemned as prize, because Germany had reserved her ratification of those provisions of the convention.

APPLICATION OF DECLARATION OF PARIS BY PRIZE COURTS

All the prize courts which were called upon to decide questions involving the application of the declaration of Paris recognized its prescriptions as constituting an established part of international law and therefore binding upon them. In the case of the Marie Glaeser, decided in September, 1914, Sir Samuel Evans reviewed the history of the declaration, and concluded as follows:

"Our own country, one of the original parties to it, has strictly adhered to it.

"This court accordingly ought to, and will, regard the declaration of Paris not only in the light of rules binding in the conduct of war but as a recognized and acknowledged part of the law of nations, which alone is the law which this court has to administer."

It was interpreted and applied by the British prize courts in various subsequent cases. The German prize court, in the case of the Indian Prince referring to the principle of "enemy ships free goods," said: "Its validity, however, is not derived from any special treaty but from common international law as laid down in the declaration respecting maritime law adopted at Paris in 1856, which, according to the German prize regulations, applies also to countries like the United States, which did not agree to that declaration." Nevertheless, while the prize courts regarded the declaration of Paris as a binding international act, they generally interpreted its provisions in a very strict sense and occasionally refused to accord claimants the benefits of the declaration when, if a more liberal interpretation had been placed upon it, their goods would have escaped condemnation. Moreover, by means of reprisals measures adopted by some of the belligerents in 1915 the provisions of the declaration were seriously infringed upon, if not disregarded.

LONDON NAVAL CONFERENCE, 1908–9

The British Government took the initiative in calling a conference with a view to reaching an agreement in regard to those matters "as to which divergent rules and principles have been enforced in the prize courts of different nations." The invitation was accepted, and in December, 1908, 37 delegates representing Austria-Hungary, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, Russia, Spain, and the United States assembled in London and adopted a declaration of 71 articles concerning the laws of naval warfare. The declaration contains a statement that the rules adopted "correspond in substance with the generally recognized principles of international law." These rules deal with such matters as contraband, blockade, continuous voyages, destruction of neutral prizes, unneutral service, and transfers of flag. An agreement was reached on all points mentioned in the program except that relating to the legality of the conversion of merchant vessels into warships on the high seas and the question as to whether the nationality or domicile of the owner should be the test in determining the enemy or neutral character of property. By article 66 the signatory powers engaged to insure the mutual observance of the rules contained in the declaration in any war in which all the belligerents were parties thereto, and to that end they agreed to issue the necessary instructions to their authorities and armed forces and to take such measures as would be required to insure that its rules would be applied by their courts and, more particularly, by their prize courts.

THE DECLARATION OF LONDON

The third conference has never been called but the preparation of the regulations recommended by the second conference was in part attempted by the international naval conference at London in 1908–9, and the results were embodied in an international act known as the Declaration of London, which had not been ratified by any of the powers at the time of the outbreak of the war. Since many of the rules embodied in the declaration were merely declaratory of the preexisting customary law and practice they were, as such, binding upon the belligerents and their prize courts, equally with other rules of customary international law, without regard to the status of the declaration in which they were embodied. Such of its rules as constituted innovations upon or departures from the customary law were not binding upon the prize courts.

The provisions of the declaration had already been embodied in the prize regulations of a number of countries before the outbreak of the war and were incorporated in those of other countries subsequent thereto. Upon the outbreak of the war the declaration, notwithstanding its nonratification, was put into effect by decrees or orders of various belligerent governments, usually with alterations or additions, although Great Britain and France subsequently revoked their orders and decrees and announced that henceforth they would not be bound by the declaration but would exercise their belligerent rights at sea in strict accordance with the "law of nations." The attitude of the prize courts toward the declaration varied with the successive changes of policy adopted by their governments in respect to the declaration.

STATUS OF THE DECLARATION OF LONDON

According to article 67 of the declaration the ratifications were to be deposited in London, and according to article 65 it was to be treated as a whole; that is to say, piecemeal ratification was not permitted for the obvious reason that it would be improper to allow a government to accept the provisions which were most favorable to its interests and to reserve acceptance of those which consist mainly of concessions. The declaration was accepted by the British Government, but it was not generally approved by public opinion in England. A bill embodying its provisions passed the House of Commons on December 7, 1911, but it was thrown out by the House of Lords. The Italian Government, although never having formally ratified it, proclaimed it to be in effect on October 13, 1912, for the war with Turkey, and it was applied by the Italian prize courts. Turkey, though not represented at the conference, likewise put the declaration into effect and applied its provisions in the war with Italy.

The United States Senate on April 24, 1912, advised and consented to the ratification of the declaration, but the ratifications had not been deposited in London when the recent war broke out. The result was that not one of the powers represented at the conference had at the outbreak of the war ratified the declaration in accordance with the procedure prescribed, and consequently none of the belligerents were bound by the instrument as a whole. Animated by a desire to see it observed by the various belligerents, the Secretary of State of the United States on August 6, 1914, instructed the American ambassador at London to inquire of the British Government whether it was willing to apply the declaration during the existing war provided Great Britain's adversaries would agree to do likewise. A similar inquiry was sent to the Governments of Russia, the German Empire, Austria-Hungary, France, and Belgium. The Austro-Hungarian Government replied that it had instructed its naval forces to observe the declaration provided Austria-Hungary's enemies observed it. The German Government replied that it would apply the declaration provided its provisions were not disregarded by the other belligerents. The British Government replied on August 22 that it had decided "to adopt generally the rules subject to certain modifications and additions which they judge indispensable to the efficient conduct of their naval operations." Aside from these changes His Majesty's Government would, without waiting to learn the intentions of the enemy governments, adhere to the rules of the declaration. The French Government agreed to observe the declaration subject substantially to the same modifications and additions as those made by England, and the Russian Government returned a similar answer. By a decree of March 25, 1917, the Italian Government put the declaration, except articles 22, 24, and 28, into effect with modifications of other articles similar to those made by Great Britain and France.

RULES OF THE DECLARATION OF LONDON

The rule finally adopted by the conference affirmed the general principle that a neutral vessel can not be destroyed, but must be taken in for adjudication by a prize court. The right of destruction was admitted in cases where conveyance of the prize ship into a home port would involve danger to the captor or to the success of the military operations in which he was at the time engaged (article 49). The effort of the British delegation to obtain express recognition of the rule that mere inability to spare a prize crew did not constitute a danger to the captor failed to receive the approval of the conference, it being regarded as unwise to undertake to specify the particular contingencies which should constitute danger.

Article 50 provided that before destruction all persons on board must be placed in safety, and all the ship's papers likely to be of value to the prize court in determining the validity of the capture must be preserved.

The declaration has never been ratified in accordance with its own provisions and was not, therefore, legally binding upon the belligerents during the recent war. Nevertheless, it was put into effect with certain modifications and additions, none of which affected substantially its rules in respect to prize destruction, except that, as already stated, the German prize regulations expressly enumerate the contingencies which shall constitute danger to the captor, or which might impede his operations, among which are inability to spare a prize crew, shortage of coal, proximity to the enemy's coasts, etc. The declaration affirmed at the outset that the rules contained in its various chapters "correspond in substance to the generally recognized law." To that extent, therefore, they were binding upon the several belligerents, even though the declaration was never ratified.

APPLICATION OF DECLARATION DURING RECENT WAR

These offers of piecemeal ratification were not, however, in accordance with article 65 of the declaration and were, therefore, unacceptable to the American Government. In a telegram of October 22, 1914, to the above-mentioned embassies and legation the Secretary of State withdrew the suggestions of the American Government that the declaration be adopted as a temporary code of naval warfare to be observed by belligerents and neutrals during the war, and announced that the American Government would "insist that the rights and duties of the United States and of its citizens in the present war be defined by the existing rules of international law and the treaties of the United States, irrespective of the provisions of the declaration of London," and that "this Government reserves to itself the rights to enter a protest or demand in each case in which those rights and duties so defined are violated."

Orders in council modifying various articles of the declaration were issued by the British Government on October 29, 1914, October 20, 1915, and March 30, 1916, and the French and Russian Governments appear to have introduced similar modifications so as to conform their action to that of Great Britain. At the outset articles 22, 24, and 28 were modified by orders putting on the list of conditional contraband various articles which are on the free list in the declaration of London and by putting on the list of absolute contraband other articles which are on the list of conditional contraband in the declaration. Article 33 was modified by the substitution of a new rule which provided that the destination referred to therein might be inferred from sufficient evidence (in addition to the presumption laid down in art. 24) and should be presumed to exist if the goods were consigned to or for an agent of an enemy State or to or for a merchant or other person under the control of the authorities of the enemy State. Article 35 was modified by an order in council which provided that, notwithstanding the provisions of that article, vessels bound for neutral ports, if the goods were consigned "to order" or if they showed a consignee in enemy territory, should be liable to capture, and the onus of proving an innocent destination was placed on the owner of the goods, thereby extending the doctrine of continuous voyage to the carriage of conditional contraband, contrary to the rule of the declaration of London.

Like the rule of the declaration (art. 19) which forbids the application of the doctrine of continuous voyage in respect to blockade was altered so as to authorize the capture of vessels bound to non-blockaded ports.

In October, 1915, the Governments of the Entente Allies announced that article 57 of the declaration, which lays down the rule that "the neutral or enemy character of a vessel is determined by the flag which she is entitled to fly," should no longer be regarded as in force, and that henceforth the prize courts should apply the rules and principles formerly observed in such courts. The objection to article 57 was that it protected from capture ships flying neutral flags, but which in fact were owned wholy or in part by persons of enemy nationality. The particular reason for abrogating the article was to enable British and French prize courts to condemn certain merchant vessels flying the American flag, but in the ownership of which German subjects held a preponderating interest.

ABROGATION OF ARTICLE 57

Both the British and French Governments at the outbreak of the war proclaimed those rules of the declaration of London relating to transfers of flag to be in force, notwithstanding the fact that neither Government had ratified the declaration. It was soon discovered that the rule laid down in article 57, namely, that the neutral or enemy character of a vessel is determined by the flag it is entitled to fly, protected German-owned vessels from capture so long as they navigated under a neutral flag. Accordingly the British Government, by an order in council of October 25, 1915, abrogated article 57 and declared that in lieu thereof the British prize courts should "apply the rules and principles formerly observed in such courts." This was to meet the situation caused by the action of German shipowners in America in resorting to the use of the American flag to protect cargoes which were being shipped from America to neutral ports in Europe, particularly in Holland, and from which they were being transshipped to Germany. The British Government took the position that this was a subterfuge; but so long as the rule of the declaration was in force, cargoes under the American flag were protected, even though the ships were German owned. The rule that the nationality of the owner should be considered as the test of enemy or friendly character was substituted for that of article 57 of the declaration of London. Six days later the French Government followed the action of the British Government, but instead of abrogating outright article 57, the same result was achieved by declaring that it should be applied during the present war, subject to the following modification: "Whenever it is established that a ship flying a neutral flag belongs in fact to the nationals of an enemy country or to parties residing in an enemy country, the ship shall accordingly be considered as an enemy ship."

PROTESTS AGAINST THE DISREGARD OF THE DECLARATION OF LONDON

The German Government addressed a protest to neutral powers against the action of the British and French Governments in thus modifying the declaration of London, although German submarines from the outset sank neutral vessels laden with cargoes of conditional contraband destined to unfortified British ports and ports not serving as bases of military operation.

The American Government in its note of December 28, 1914, to the British Government, in respect to the detention of neutral ships and their cargoes, refrained from discussing at that time the propriety of including certain articles in the contraband list, although it asserted that some of them were open to objection. The note said that the right of belligerents to determine what they shall regard as contraband and to adopt such classification as they choose can not be denied, but it is well established that their action must be in conformity with existing treaties and the generally recognized rules of international law. The right can not, therefore, be arbitrarily exercised. When the French Government in 1895 announced its intention of treating rice as contraband when destined to Chinese ports north of Canton, Lord Granville stated that "His Majesty's Government feel themselves bound to reserve their rights of protesting at once against the doctrine that it is for the belligerent to decide what is and what is not contraband of war, regardless of the well-established rights of neutrals." During the Russo-Japanese War Lord Lansdowne, in a communication of July 29, 1904, to Secretary of State John Hay, apropos of the action of the Russian Government in putting coal, naphtha, and other fuel on the list of absolute contraband expressed substantially the same view, and so did Mr. Hay in his protest against the condemnation of the cargoes of the Arabia and the Calchas.

The distinction between absolute and conditional contraband is as old as Grotius, and as a principle of international law it had never been contested by the United States or Great Britain.

PRIZE COURT—ORDERS IN COUNCIL

The power of the Crown to prescribe or alter prize law had been affirmed from very early times. Since the Silesian loan controversy, however, and consequent upon the report of the committee appointed to consider the subject, the doctrine has been advanced that a prize court is not bound by the executive orders of the Crown when they are contrary to international law. By an ingenious argument Lord Stowell attempted in the Fox to effect a reconciliation between the two propositions by holding that the latter presumed to conform to principles of the unwritten law of nations. But any such presumption in favor of orders in council was expressly overruled by the Zamora decision. On the other hand, there can be no doubt that a prize court must give effect to the acts of the legislative in matters of prize, even if contrary to international law. An act of Parliament, passed by Lords and Commons, and assented to by the King, is supreme and binding on all English courts. (Colombos, p. 13 ff.)

SIR WILLIAM SCOTT—WAR CONTRABAND AND BLOCKADE

The doctrine of Sir William Scott respecting war contraband and blockade goes beyond the "Consolato del Mare," is based only on the idea of necessity, and extends the right of capture to the utmost limit. The English prize courts in former times held very indefinite and arbitrary views respecting contraband of war. When Marriott presided, these views were still further extended, and particularly from the year 1793 to the end of the eighteenth century. Scarcely any object of neutral commerce was left free from condemnation, or not liable to the right of preemption at that time. Sir William Scott also followed these precedents, and his list of prohibited articles was consequently enlarged or reduced according to the circumstances and the exigencies of war. (Katchenovsky, pp. 90 f; Pritchard, 103–113; Wheaton, History, pp. 131, 135.)

Former admiralty judges generally condemned as lawful prize not only the ship but the rest of the cargo. Sir William Scott admitted many exceptions to this rule; according to his opinion, general condemnation is a just punishment for violation of international law, but if, in case of war contraband, ship and cargo belong to different persons, then it is necessary, as far as possible, to distinguish the innocent from the guilty. (Katchenovsky, p. 92. Where the owner of the cargo has any interest in the ship, the whole of his property will be involved in the same sentence of condemnation. To escape the contagion of contraband, the article must be the property of a different owner. On the contrary, Portalis considered the ship liable to condemnation only when the contraband formed more than three-quarters of the whole cargo. Martens, Merkw. Falle, ii, 221; Jacobsen, pr. Seerecht, ii, 80–93.) The penalty for the importation of war contraband in the prize courts falls on the neutral only when he is taken in flagrante delicto, i. e., at any place between that of departure and destination. Sir William Scott was not contented with this extensive interpretation and considered as lawful prize even ships on their return voyage, if they had before carried contraband.

SIR WILLIAM SCOTT—BLOCKADE

In the rules laid down by him relating to blockade Sir William Scott exceeds the limits of moderation. It is notorious that a blockade, like a siege on land, is an operation of war directed chiefly against the enemy; the English judge, however, endeavors to turn it principally against neutrals. In vain we search in his judgments for any solid definition or strict logical deductions. His arriere-pensee appears to be to give as much liberty as possible to privateers. He does not consider it the duty of cruisers to besiege closely the port but chiefly to exercise surveillance over neutrals; and it is by no means forbidden to them to leave their station for the purpose of pursuing suspected vessels. (Katchenovsky, p. 93 f. The principle decisions of Sir William Scott regarding blockade are collected in Pritchard, 36–49, and Wildman, ii, 184.) In general the English were not in the habit of giving notice of blockade to other governments, on the alleged ground that the news would spread of itself, a practice which directly tended to the injury of neutral commerce. All the powerful logic of Sir William Scott would appear to have been directed to the justification of cruisers and privateers in seizing neutral vessels wherever they were met with. In the opinion of the English, extensive coasts and whole countries might be declared to be in view than to supply the deficiency of a regular navy by the severity of prize law. (Katchenovsky, p. 94 f.)

SCOTT, PORTALIS—PAPER BLOCKADES

Sir William Scott held the neutral responsible for breaking through blockades till the end of the return voyage. Such being the opinion of Sir William Scott concerning blockade, it is scarcely necessary to show that his interpretations of the law was in direct contradiction to that of European nations. He was himself hardly satisfied with the grounds upon which he proceeded and sometimes endeavored to define more strictly the limits of such fictitious blockade; but as his duty was to protect the "maritime interests" of his country, he had recourse to forced arguments in order to carry out the harsh decrees of the Government against neutral merchants or in favor of cruisers and privateers. (Sir William Scott admitted of exceptions to his rules only for the benefit of subjects of the United States of America, Denmark, and Sweden, according to treaties.) Portalis in this respect remained more true to his liberal principles, as the ordonnances of the year 1778 did not admit of any extension of contraband of war, and rejected all paper blockades. (Katchenovsky, p. 96 f.)

SIR WILLIAM SCOTT—COST AND DAMAGES

It is evident that Sir William Scott, though adhering to the rules of the Consolato del Mare, endeavored to cut off all the important branches of neutral commerce. It still further suffered from his partiality to privateers, as evidenced in his decisions respecting costs and damages. According to his opinion, the privateer, even in cases of restitution, is entitled to indemnification; and he imposed upon neutrals payment of expenses, if there be the slightest excuse for the seizure of the vessel, the least doubt of the legality of the transaction in which they have been engaged, or any defects in the ship's papers. On the other hand, he considered the prize courts not legally bound to award compensation to neutral merchants (later on, Lord Kingsdown, in delivering the sentence of the Court of Appeal in the case of the Ostsee, laid it down that, where there was not any probable cause of seizure, the neutral was entitled to restitution with costs and damages. Moore, ix, 150,—Tr.) for the following reasons: 1. Neutral commerce is only allowed on condition of visitation and arrest on the part of the belligerents. 2. International law only enjoins privateers to pay freight for goods of an enemy; as to other costs (under the name of international law, Sir William Scott evidently understood the Consolato del Mare; but he sometimes himself set aside its rules, and did not allow freight to the neutral merchants in cases of coasting or colonial trade, or when they were detected in concealing their papers, etc. All these restrictions were his own. Pritchard, 164–173; Wildman, ii, 153–163) no mention is made of them. Portalis acted with much more moderation in this respect. As prize judge, he felt it equally his duty to give damages and compensation to both parties, as well for the losses actually sustained as for the "lucrum cessans." (Katchenovsky, p. 98 f. If a seizure is made without probable cause, the captor is adjudged to pay costs and damages for which purpose privateers were obliged to give security. Wildman vol. II, p. 353. (Treaty between England and Holland, 1668 and 1674; between England and France, 1677; between England and Holland, 1697; the Treaty of Utrecht, 1713.))

THE ENGLISH INTERNATIONAL LAW

In their decisions Sir William Scott and Portalis were in the habit of referring to international law. (Pritchard, 3, 163, 312; Wildman, ii, 360; Martens, Merkw. Falle, ii, 225); and feeling it their duty to be guided by its principles, they relied upon precedents from history, and, in conformity with these, have laid down many important rules. We are not inclined to attribute to their decisions such universal authority as many publicists do, who endeaver to construct a customary international law upon them, and even give preference to that system rather than to existing treaties. (To this class belong all English jurists, as Robinson, Chitty, Oke Manning, Reddie, and Wildman. Their confidence in Sir William Scott is unlimited; they consider him as the "viva vox" of international law, and attribute to his opinions undisputed authority.) Examining carefully the English and French practice, we come to the conclusion that neither one nor the other strictly adhered to the rules of European public law. The customary law to which Sir William Scott constantly refers can hardly be considered as of universal operation. Being purely English law, however long its precedents may have existed, they are not binding on neutral nations. Thus the construction of international law, as laid down by Sir William Scott, often appears obscure and vague, for he does not rely on treaties or customs reciprocally observed by governments, but chiefly confines himself to such decrees as instructions to privateers, orders in council, etc., and to the rules laid down by the judges who preceded him, from Coke to Marriott. Deprived of this support, he seldom laid down exact definitions, and consequently his doctrine varied according to the circumstances of war—in short, Sir William Scott gave no security to neutral commerce, but subjected it to the belligerent or to his conception of "jus extremae necessitatis." (Katchenovsky, p. 100 ff.)

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, all my life I have labored under the handicap of finding very often that there are two sides to every question. I discover that to be so in this instance; and I find no fault with either side for its opinion. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the proposed amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] contains some of the essence of peace for the world. I would add to it the abolishment of that part of international law called the law of conquest, the right of a nation which has the power to take anything it wants to take and to keep it.

Because nations, Mr. President, have refused to ratify treaties guaranteeing the rights of neutrals in time of war we have the world arming to-day as it never before armed. In spite of the clamor of humanity for peace, the fact remains that governments have so far failed to take any practical steps toward peace. We hear a great deal of talk about international law; we hear a great deal of talk about freedom of the seas. Every nation respects international law in time of peace and every nation favors the freedom of the seas in time of peace; but no nation so far has shown any inclination to enter into any kind of a binding agreement to respect either the freedom of the seas or international law in time of war, archaic as the law is. Until that shall have been done, it seems to me we are wasting our efforts in talking about peace. International law must be revised and obeyed if we are to have peace.

The nations gathered at The Hague in 1907, and out of the conference there held came the idea that an international prize court should be established for the purpose of determining or adjudicating cases that might arise between belligerents and neutrals in time of war; that what was contraband should be defined.

Great Britain took the position that that only should be done, that a prize court should be established only after a codification of international law had been effected defining the rights of neutrals and belligerents in time of war and defining what was contraband and what was not contraband. The Government of Great Britain called a conference in 1907, and out of that conference—held in 1908—came what has been called the declaration of London, setting forth what should be considered to be the rights of neutrals and of belligerents in time of war. No country saw fit to ratify that declaration. At the beginning of the World War the British Government, which had called the conference resulting in the declaration of London, was the first Government to repudiate that declaration.

When Great Britain did that Great Britain did not do anything unusual. Because Great Britain happens to do something at a certain time that other nations have also done, at least in principle, I can not find any reason for using that as an excuse to "twist the lion's tail." Great Britain only followed in the footsteps of the nations of the world which so far as international relations are concerned are governed in the last analysis only by one law, and that is the law of the tooth and the claw; the law which says that to him who is strong and swift and cunning belongs everything that he has the power to take. That is the law of the wolf pack; that is the law of the jungle; and that, in the last analysis, is the law that is governing the international relations of nations to-day.

It does not make any difference how many fine phrases we use in times of peace, when a controversy arises no nation recognizes any law but the law of the wolf pack. The League of Nations is governed by the same law. It was formed for no other purpose than to keep the status quo, to protect the victors in the last war in the ownership of the loot of conquest they got out of the last World War. It rests on the law of force. It guarantees possession of territory acquired by the World War.

I have never been able to agree with those who consider cruisers doves of peace. I have always believed and still believe that they are dogs of war; they are built for war. I have no illusion about them being doves of peace. They are built for business. I have no sympathy with the contention that they are causes of war. They are only the instruments of war; they are the symptoms of a deep-seated disease.

When a nation declares war that in itself is not the cause of war. When it declares war it will use any instrument that it thinks is necessary for its own protection and necessary to win. That principle was not changed in the last World War, and no war in the history of humanity has ever changed that principle. So let us not have any illusion about that.

The question for the world to determine is whether or not there shall be such a change of international law in time of peace as will abandon the law of conquest. I am more concerned about a revision of international law than its restatement. I had hoped that the nations of the world would be willing to come together in conference and abandon the law of the wolf pack, the law of the jungle, the law of the tiger; in other words, the law of conquest. I had hoped that within the next year or two such a conference would be possible; that the nations of the world would not only agree upon the rights of neutrals and belligerents but would agree to ratify a treaty containing such provisions. Such a treaty should exempt food from the contraband list. That would protect England in time of war, for then no nation could stop food from going to England. That ought also to satisfy the United States; that is, it ought to satisfy us to the extent that we could trade, and our trade should be free upon the seas so far as it is noncontraband.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The Senator from Minnesota used the term "noncontraband." I presume, then, that he would want contraband defined so that it would be limited directly to instrumentalities of war; he would not want it to be broad enough to cover food and clothing and things of that kind?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No; I would not want it so broad as it was declared to be in the orders of council of the British Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. May I not have 10 minutes on the bill, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair assumes that the Senator has been speaking on the amendment. He can now speak for 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Chair.

The orders in council adopted by the British Government in the early part of the last World War I consider were a very violent interference with our commerce. I think, from the standpoint of international law and from the standpoint of international safety, we should have been perfectly justified to have taken steps to break through and convoy our commerce. Our failure to insist upon our rights properly at that time, at least, I am so convinced in my own mind, had a great deal to do with bringing us into the war later.

A weak nation in a controversy of this kind would not receive much respect or attention from the other nations of the world. We are so rich and so strong that I think we can afford not to be too afraid; I think we can afford to be courageous to the extent of serving notice upon the other nations of the world that unless they will abandon the law of conquest, the law of the jungle, when a controversy shall arise, we can play that game a little bit stronger than any other nation. We are willing, if other nations will reciprocate, to sit at the conference table and eliminate philosophies that are centuries old, that come down from the Middle Ages and from the days of barbarism. Unless the nations of the world will agree to do that, and abide by such a law, then it will be for the Government of the United States and the people of the United States to determine whether or not we shall prepare to go out and fight for the trade of the world with any other nation that is ready to fight to take that trade away from us. If this country is forced to make such a choice I have no illusion what that decision will be.

I have no sympathy with the idea that the United States should have a larger navy than that possessed by any other nation in the world. Too much power in the hands of any nation is a dangerous thing, as is too much power in the hands of any individual. I do not believe that any nation is so good and so altruistic and is imbued with such a sense of justice that it may be entrusted with the control of the sea power of the world. The nation that controls the sea power will control the commerce of the world; the nation that controls the commerce of the world controls the destinies of the world. The issues involved and the destinies involved are too great in their potential consequences to be entrusted to any one nation. That includes the United States.

Because of these views, I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] on yesterday, which provided for elimination of the time clause, and I intend to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and I may vote for some other amendments, in the hope that an agreement may be reached, that the nations of the world will come together in conference after having had notice from the strongest nation of the world that we are willing to forego the power that we have and the might, if we want to exercise it, to dominate the sea.

We were told that the World War was "a war to end war"—a doctrine to which I never subscribed and in which I never believed; nor did I ever believe that it was a war to "save the world for democracy"; and I think the present conditions of the world bear me out in that judgment. We know now, by the results, that it was the same old game of a war for conquest; that "to the victor belong the spoils." It only confirmed, and the present condition of the world confirms, the fact that Hegel was right when he said that the only thing humanity can learn from history is that we can not learn from history. I hope the world in the next two years will repudiate that statement of Hegel.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I stated a few moments ago that I was perfectly willing the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] should be accepted in lieu of the amendment which I proposed some months ago. I think the objective of the Senator from Missouri and mine are the same. We have in view the desirability of securing, if possible, an understanding or agreement between the maritime powers with reference to the rights of neutrals or with reference to the rights of those nations who in time of war desire to live in peace and to pursue peaceful methods.

I therefore am perfectly agreeable to the adoption of the Senator's substitute. I desire to say a word, however, in regard to the substitute or the principle which is involved.

I look upon the present stressful outlook between naval powers as being determined in a large measure by this question of the rights of belligerents and neutrals at sea. I quite agree with the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that unless we can come to an agreement, which agreement we are willing to accept, with reference to the rights of neutrals, unless we can come to an understanding between nations as to the legal use of the sea there is no such thing as naval disarmament. I go further and express the view that not only is there no such thing as naval disarmament or the reduction of naval armaments, but the failure to reach an understanding will undoubtedly lead to a competitive naval race. I can see no other alternative.

It is therefore the desire of the proponents of this measure that we exhaust every means at hand to come to an understanding which will remove the controversies which are calculated to bring on building and ultimately, perhaps, something much worse than building.

I am, Mr. President, thoroughly in favor of protecting American commerce; but I am in favor of protecting it in so far as we can through peaceful means, under legal procedure, and without the employment of naval instruments for protection. I do not want to rely upon force or depend upon force if there is any way among men to avoid it. I look upon every effort to bring about a reign of law instead of a reign of force as helpful to every other scheme for peace.

As I see the future, I see no controversy arising between this country and Great Britain or any other naval power save a controversy which might arise over the use of our ships in time of war. As I said a few days ago, I do not believe that Great Britain has any purpose of attacking the United States or seeking a quarrel with the United States. I am quite sure the United States has no intention of seeking a quarrel with Great Britain; but if a war breaks out anywhere, and our tremendous commerce is imperiled, and our interests are in jeopardy, it creates a state of war in the mind of the Nation, whether in actuality or not; and the result is that we proceed from one step to another with the controversy unsolved, and under such circumstances no one can foretell what the ultimate result may be.

Woodrow Wilson said at St. Louis, after the World War was over and after all the different reasons had been assigned for the coming on of the war, that at bottom the World War was a war over commerce; that at bottom it was a contest for commercial supremacy. I quite agree with that interpretation, though it was not the only reason. But I have no doubt that the real moving, underlying compelling power which drove the nations into conflict was a controversy over their commercial rights and ambitions touching their commercial supremacy. And so, Mr. President, when we undertake to adjust those rights and to have an understanding in regard to them we are undertaking to remove that which may lead to a repetition of what happened in 1914.

But there is another phase of this matter which concerns me, and that is the obligation which rests upon us to avoid, if possible, any greater expenditure of the public money, any greater expenditure from the Public Treasury, thereby increasing the burden of taxation upon the people of the United States and throughout the world.

I think the question of taxation and the economic condition of the people in a country can not be overlooked in considering the question of preparedness itself. The powerful nation, the dominant nation, the ultimately victorious nation in the coming conflicts will be the nation whose nationals are economically strong, the nation which is financially powerful, and which is able to cope with the economic conflict which now accompanies conflicts between armies and navies. It is just as essential in the question of preparedness to keep in mind the burden which we are constantly imposing upon the taxpayers of our country as it is to build battleships and cruisers.

Taxation is no longer merely an economic problem. It has reached the point where it is a moral problem. These constant and remorseless exactions of government no longer prey upon the profits of the people alone, but they are eating into the necessities, and therefore into the moral fiber, of the people.

It is true that we are a comparatively new nation, and a strong nation. It is true that we are rich, marvelously rich, in natural wealth, and that we have an energetic and industrious people. But even so, Mr. President, at the present time we in this country are exacting from agriculture, the great basic industry, one-third of its income, less other expenses, for taxes. I undertake to say that no industry can live under such conditions. Other sectors of the community are being taxed, only less drastically than agriculture.

I do not doubt but that Senators have received, as I know I have, letters from business men, especially small business men, the backbone of our business interests, telling us that they are being ruined, literally ruined, by taxation. If that is the condition in this country, where we are more fortunate, reflect upon what the condition is in other countries. The conditions arising from taxation and the burdens of government in some countries are simply appalling. Children are stunted and starved and denied the ordinary pleasures of childhood in order that their governments may have means by which to buy armaments; for take into consideration the fact that 80 per cent of our taxes and 90 per cent of the taxes of some other nations are for the purpose of war, for the expenses either before or after! Families are broken and scattered in their pathetic struggle for existence, that governments may have armaments. So I say that I look upon the question of protecting our economic life as a primary element in preparedness. Those whom we are thus exploiting are the very foundation of national strength.

There is a limit to their endurance. The mind will ultimately give way under such torture. The will must break and purpose become confusion under such endless, fruitless strain. There are millions of people in countries which are called advanced countries going through life with no chance to leave one penny to their own. There are millions with no goal at the end of the struggle save the pauper's grave. They are growing bitter. The evidence of it is in every country under God's shining sun. It is my deliberate judgment that the most vital element of preparedness in all countries, the one thing essential to security, is the better and more favorable treatment of the great mass of the people, is relief from these constantly increasing burdens of government. The one thing essential to world peace at this time is contentment and happiness among the people. We do well to equalize this kind of preparedness and consider it along with the question of battleships and cruisers. It is indeed essential to round out our preparedness program, not alone by constructing more armaments but also by looking after the interests of those who must do the fighting and who must bear the weight of the government in every conflict.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Idaho upon the amendment has expired.

Mr. BORAH. I will speak a few moments on the bill.

I therefore favor any reasonable program which may lessen the competition, which may lessen the rivalry between maritime nations, that we may save people from the demoralizing burdens of governments.

Mr. President, it has been estimated that at the close of the World War there had been fastened upon the human family a debt of $300,000,000,000. These figures may or may not be accurate; I do not know. Perhaps there is no way to secure absolutely accurate figures; but, whatever the figures are, they are beyond the power of the human mind to estimate when you undertake to estimate them in foot-pounds of human toil. This is the amount which was expended in a quarter of a century for armaments and for the killing of 10,000,000 human beings and the wounding of 20,000,000 more.

In order that this money may be paid, men and women will have to drudge for decades. In order that this money may be made and turned over to those fortunate enough to hold the securities, children yet unborn will slave to the end of the road. And now, 10 years after the war, this amount is practically undiminished. It has been decreased in some countries and increased in others, but in the sum total it is practically what it was at the close of the great world conflict.

With this burden of $300,000,000,000 resting as an eternal mortgage upon the brain and the energy of the human family, is it not our duty to do everything within our power to avoid a condition of affairs which will heap upon them an additional burden? Is there any task for the leader and the statesman so imperative as that of staying this economic blight?

I repeat that that enters into the question of preparedness just as much as battleships and cruisers. And please bear in mind, Mr. President, that the world's combined armaments at this time are as heavy, if not heavier, than they were when the saturnalia of carnage broke in 1914.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I wanted to bring out one matter, that the armaments of other countries have been to a large extent financed through loans from this country.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator. At the present time, speaking now of the world in general, there are more men in arms, and the weapons of warfare are more costly and more destructive than when the incident at Sarajevo unleashed the nations to their orgy of blood. Shall we continue to pile up armaments or shall we seek methods which avoid in part at least the fearful weight?

What those have in mind who urge a better understanding is not so much the hope that in case war comes that understandings will be observed but the hope is that by the understanding the possibility of a war coming may be further removed—made more unlikely—that we may prevent war.

I have very little confidence in treaties or peace plans operating and working effectively after war actually breaks, but I do believe that through these methods we may make it far more improbable that war will come. It seems to me that if we can have an understanding among the nations as to the right to the use of the seas, there will be removed, psychologically and in fact, a condition which is calculated to bring on conflict.

I said in the beginning I am thoroughly in favor of protecting our commerce; if need be, we will protect it by a navy; but let us combine with that and join with that an earnest effort toward the adjusting of matters without the Navy. Of course, we shall never be entirely free from armament, certainly not so far as we can see, but any understanding such as might be brought about will be calculated to make the armaments less heavy, the conditions less calculated to bring on a naval race.

It is said that we can build, that we have the means to build, and that we can outbuild any other power; and so we can. I readily understand that. That is to say, we can build with less trouble and with less burden to our people than perhaps any other nation in the world. But the fact that we can build will not at all stop a naval race once it starts, because the ability to build is not the test under such conditions. The nations will build under a sense of fear. How much will they exact from their people regardless of whether their people are able to pay it or not?

The ability of governments to find the savings of the poor, and the ability of the poor to suffer and still produce is one of the mysteries of war finance. The ability to build is not the test which we force upon other nations in case we go forward.

What we do is to impose a condition which will compel them to bleed their people white in order to preserve themselves. The obligation rests upon us to be conservative and to be considerate, rich as we are, in order that we may not impose cruelty and injustice upon others.

As I have listened to this debate in the Senate from day to day it has not seemed to me that there is so very much difference among Senators. I take it that all Members of the Senate, so far as they have expressed themselves, are in favor of protecting our commerce and protecting our rights. Some believe that much may be accomplished along the lines indicated by the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri; some have less faith in it. But suppose the Senator from Missouri and myself are entirely mistaken. I see no possible harm to come from the effort. On the other hand, as was said by the Senator from Arkansas, if something is accomplished, much good may result therefrom, and it would be an achievement without any sacrifice upon the part of the people of the United States. It would be moving in the right direction, with no possible injury should we fail. I do not believe we will fail. The public opinion and the consciences of men everywhere are for better understandings and for peaceful adjustments of international controversies.

It has been said elsewhere, not here, that there is very little chance of accomplishing anything, and therefore this movement has been rather discouraged. What I have to say in answer to that is this, that if those upon whom rests the responsibility of taking the initiative feel that the object can not be accomplished, they will likely not undertake it, but considering the great problem before us, realizing what it means if it is not solved, understanding the consequences which will follow in case it is not finally adjusted, in my opinion, those responsible in directing the affairs of our country would utterly fail in the discharge of their duty should they refuse to undertake to bring about such an understanding between the nations. Great tasks call for initiative, for courage, for faith. If these are wanting, the people must suffer and carry on—at least they must suffer, and possibly they will carry on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], as modified, to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MOSES. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] is absent from the Senate on account of illness. I ask that this announcement stand for the day. He is paired on all these questions with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. HOWELL] is absent on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. REED of Missouri and Mr. BORAH called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr McLEAN], but I have reason to believe that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL'S name was called). My colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is unavoidably detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I transfer my pair——

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator need not transfer the pair. I think there is no question but that the senior Senator from Wisconsin, if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR. Upon the authority of that statement I vote "yea."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. I am informed that on all questions connected with this bill he would vote as I shall vote, and therefore I am free to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TYDINGS, when his name was called, answered "Present."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who is absent on account of illness. I am advised, however, that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote. I will therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WHEELER (when his name was called). On this matter I have a pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]. I understand that if present he would vote as I would, and therefore I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on account of illness. I would like to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. BLAINE. My colleague the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is unavoidably absent. I am privileged to announce that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. LARRAZOLO] are detained on account of illness. If present, they would vote "yea."

The roll call resulted—yeas 81, nay 1, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas are 81, nay 1. So the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] as modified, to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], is agreed to.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, all I have to say is that I would rather be right than be President.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I present editorials from the Baltimore Sun of Sunday, November 19, 1928, and the Washington News of February 4, 1929, relative to the pending cruiser construction bill, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore (Md.) Sun, November 19, 1928]

SMASH THE JINGOES' SCHEME

The big-navy men, led by Senator HALE, understand perfectly that the Kellogg treaty is inconsistent with a policy of great armaments; therefore, before Congress meets they begin jockeying to hold back action on the treaty so they can get under the wire first, with plans for a quarter of a billion building program. Equally on grounds of good faith and of national economy this scheme of the militarists and jingoes ought to be smashed.

To rush a great naval building program at Washington before the Kellogg treaty can be acted upon; to rush such a program as though that treaty had never been heard of, as though the will of the people against armament building were not demonstrated in all great nations, as there were no barrier and no hope against another naval race such as Europe knew in the decades preceding 1914, is simply indefensible. To refuse to use the Kellogg treaty as a starting point for another movement to restrict armaments would be a betrayal of the people. To go ahead with a great naval program, arguing that it is not in conflict with the Kellogg treaty, would be bald hypocrisy and reckless waste of public funds.

[From the Washington News of February 4, 1929]

REPLACING GHOSTS

"I ask you to remember that our cruiser-building policy has not been a policy of increasing numbers, but of replacement."

Now, who do you think said that? Secretary Wilbur. No; you are wrong—and right. That is the chief argument of Wilbur and Chairman HALE of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee and other boosters for the 15-cruiser bill before the Senate.

But this particular quotation is from W. C. Bridgeman, First Lord of the Admiralty, speaking to the British Constitution Club.

There in a nutshell—or a bombshell—you have the explanation of the method by which both the British Parliament and the American Congress are led unwittingly into an armament race which once started, is almost impossible to stop. How plausible the argument is made to sound, that a new building program is not really new at all, but merely a matter of replacements.

That argument is absurd when applied to the bill before the Senate. Two of the cruisers that are being "replaced" are the Rochester and the Olympia of Spanish war fame. Those ships, laid down nearly 40 years ago, have been "replaced" by every building program since the war. So with the 20 other cruisers, laid down between 1895 and 1905. As late as last spring even the Navy Department supposed these 22 had been replaced to death, but now they are salvaged again for the same purpose.

But precisely the same sort of thing is being put over on the British by their Admiralty. Only the British case is even worse.

Whatever tricks the Admiralty may resort to, why can't our own Navy Department be frank about the issue? It is not a question of American replacements but of building up to equal British strength. Britain always has been superior in cruisers. Since the Washington naval conference she has increased her superiority. As a result the American people, as well as the Navy Department, are now determined for the first time to achieve parity.

Anglo-American parity can be achieved either by a large American building program, or by a limitation agreement.

We believe it is dangerous and unfriendly to resort to the threat of an armament race until the possibility of peaceful negotiation by the Hoover administration and the forthcoming new British Government has been exhausted. The cruiser bill should be postponed in the interest of Anglo-American friendship and world peace.

But whether the bill is postponed or passed, its advocates should cease their transparent propaganda about "replacements."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I have already announced the absence of the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] on account of illness. In his absence and in his behalf I offer the following amendment, and in connection with it I wish to state that the Senator, who is the author of the amendment, will be content with a viva voce vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 5, strike out "one aircraft carrier" and insert the following: "three aircraft carriers."

On page 1, strike out lines 10 and 11, and insert the following:

(b) One aircraft carrier during each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1929, 1930, and 1931, to cost, including armor and armament, not to exceed $19,000,000 each.

On page 2, line 1, strike out "$19,000,000."

On page 2, line 19, strike out the word "carrier" and insert the word "carriers."

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I do not see why we should adopt this amendment. I do not see why we who are favorable to the enactment of the bill should consider its adoption favorably. I do not see that there is any sense in overloading the bill. The Navy Department of the Government has recommended one aircraft carrier. I think they know their business better than the Senator from Connecticut does. I think it would be a matter of unfortunate tendency for the Senate to adopt such an amendment on the spur of the moment and to direct the construction of two more aircraft carriers at a cost of $19,000,000 each, thereby adding $38,000,000 to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 5, strike out "fifteen" and insert "nine," and in line 7, strike out "Five" and insert "Three."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the only object sought to be accomplished by this amendment is to reduce from 15 to 9 the number of cruisers authorized to be constructed. The second part of the amendment proposing to strike out "five" and to insert "three" merely carries out the idea of the proposed reduction, so that three cruisers instead of five will be constructed each year. I do not care to take up the time of the Senate in discussing the amendment. However, I desire a roll call on the amendment, and I am willing now to take the vote, so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAINE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. I understand if he were present he would vote "nay," and if I were privileged to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). I desire to state that my colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is necessarily absent from the Senate on account of illness.

Mr. BRATTON (when Mr. LARRAZOLO's name was called). My colleague the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. LARRAZOLO] is absent from the Chamber on account of illness. If present, he would vote "nay." He has been unable to secure a pair.

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay." If the Senator from Louisiana were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is unavoidably absent on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when Mr. METCALF's name was called). I desire to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] is absent on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WHEELER (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote

"yea," and I understand that if the Senator from Connecticut were present and voting he would vote "nay."

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], who is unavoidably absent from the Chamber; but having reason to suppose that, if present, he would vote as I intend to vote, I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 69, as follows:

YEAS—12

Black	Burton	King	Nye
Borah	Frazier	McMaster	Shipstead
Brookhart	Harrison	Norris	Thomas, Okla.

So the amendment of Mr. NORRIS was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk and ask that the clerk may read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, at the end of line 3, it is proposed to strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following:

and the President is hereby requested to ask the Government of Great Britain to enter into an agreement with the Government of the United States providing for a limitation on behalf of said Governments in the construction of naval vessels such as are provided for in paragraph (a) of section 1 hereof; and during the negotiation for such an agreement, the authority to construct the naval vessels provided for in said paragraph (a) of section 1 is hereby suspended. If such an agreement is entered into, then the authority to construct naval vessels as provided in said paragraph (a) of section 1 is hereby modified to the extent necessary to carry out said agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think one thing is perfectly apparent, and that is that our Government is prepared to meet any emergency and is prepared to meet with a great advantage in naval armament any nation in the world upon the sea with the one exception of Great Britain; and that, after all, the question of naval armament for practical purposes reduces itself to that of Great Britain and that of the United States. I believe it is also perfectly apparent to everybody that the remainder of the world is watching those two Governments as far as naval armament is concerned. Whenever a naval ship is built anywhere on the globe by any nation, except Great Britain or the United States, the reason given for its construction is that Great Britain or the United States or both of them are the leading nations of the world, and they are continually building more warships. The other nations are building additional warships because they consider it imperative in the race for armament that is led by Great Britain and the United States.

An agreement between Great Britain and the United States as to naval armament would make the limitation of armament so far as other nations are concerned, in the first place, almost unnecessary; but, in the next place, it would stop the building of naval vessels everywhere in the civilized world.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator if the whole purpose of his amendment is not covered by section 4 of the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. I think not. The amendment I have offered applies, Mr. President, only to Great Britain; there is no conference provided for by the amendment and none is sought except one with Great Britain. In my judgment the history of the discussion of the limitation of armament for the last 10 years in the parliaments of the world practically demonstrates that a limitation of armament, agreed to by Great Britain and by the United States, will accomplish the result that all the peace-loving peoples of the civilized world desire to see accomplished.

I have previously said in this debate that I conceded absolute good faith to every Member of this body, and, in fact, to all the people of this country, as being actuated by an earnest, honest desire to bring about peaceful methods for the solution of international disputes. If the race is between these two great nations, and if a limitation of armaments is desirable—and the latter proposition no one will dispute—then it seems to me it logically follows that an agreement between these two leading armed nations as to their limitation of armaments will be one of the greatest steps that can possibly be taken for peace.

It will be observed, too, if you will examine the amendment, that it applies only to such ships as are named in paragraph (a) of section 1 of the bill. That means cruisers. There is no attempt to take into consideration anything but cruisers; and that seems to be the race now between these two nations. Everything else is eliminated in order that all possible question that might bring about disagreement or dispute may be eliminated from the conference.

It would be much easier for the United States and Great Britain to get an agreement as to one particular line of armament than if the proposition covered all kinds of armament, where a great many other questions would enter in, where all kinds of excuses could be given by either or both of the parties that would make it impossible to bring about an agreement. But, Mr. President, if Congress puts this provision in the bill the entire world will know it. Every civilized nation in the world will at once direct its attention to Great Britain. If America makes this proposition to our only rival on the sea, especially coming right after we have ratified the peace treaty, the sentiment of the entire civilized world will then be directed to the action of Great Britain. Will she accept the hand of friendship that will be extended by this provision put into the law? Will she spurn the offer of this Government, her only rival on the sea, and refuse to enter into a conference with us to limit between our two great leading Governments the building of cruisers?

The people of Great Britain will be demanding of their Government that this offer be accepted. It will not be necessary to go out over the world to get a whole lot of other nations to come in. It will not be necessary to have the agreement approved by other nations of the world. It will be necessary only for these two nations to agree. I appeal to Senators who are anxious to build a great, big navy, who are anxious to start our Government in the greatest race of modern times, in the building of armed ships, before we use the money of the taxpayers, running into hundreds of millions of dollars, let us give our one rival an opportunity to extend the hand of friendship and meet us half way in a compromise on this subject.

It seems to me there can be no possible objection to such a course. It seems to me that all of us who are trying to maintain the peace of the world, trying to stop this mad race in the building of armed vessels upon the sea, ought to be willing at least to go far enough to say to the only nation with whom we are competing in the building of cruisers, "We are willing now to meet and face you across the table of peace and friendship, and try to agree, if we can, upon saving the money that the taxpayers of both these nations must pay if we neglect to do something now."

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, there are two objections to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], which I desire to present as succinctly as I can.

First, I think the amendment is not as good as the provision in the pending bill. Under section 4 of the pending bill the President is authorized, as soon as an international agreement is made, to stop the construction of every vessel authorized in this bill; and the bill asks and directs him to seek to get an agreement. The very bill carries an olive branch of peace and reconciliation; and the minute an agreement is made for the limitation of armaments the entire construction under this bill stops.

Only a short time ago we had a conference at Geneva. We offered to agree to any reduction of armaments—not an increase, but a reduction—on the ratio of 5-5-3. Are we now to come and beg again for a limitation of armaments? Is America to stand perpetually begging, begging, begging for a conference, when it waited 15 years before it constructed any cruisers and when Great Britain during that time was constructing cruisers?

It appears to me that there is no occasion for reassembling this conference. That offer is open. Any time, any day, and any minute that Great Britain or Japan will accept it the construction under this bill will cease.

There is another vice in this amendment: It says that the construction of these vessels shall cease while the negotiations are pending. All it is necessary to do is to have the negotiations delayed, delayed, and delayed, talk and talk and talk, year in and year out, and there is no construction. If we grew tired of the negotiations the only way in which we could construct these vessels under this amendment would be abruptly to break off the negotiations, which would produce friction and would be embarrassing to any government. We never could start construction except by producing an apprehension growing out of the fact that negotiations had been broken off between the United States and Great Britain; and that in itself is not desirable.

It seems to me the provision contained in the bill which authorizes the President to stop the construction of every ship authorized the minute an international agreement is made, and he is especially requested to try to obtain such an agreement, is quite sufficient.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. What does the Senator understand there by the word "agreement"—a treaty?

Mr. SWANSON. No; an international agreement to limit armament, either by treaty or an agreement; we do not say what method. I suppose it would be by treaty. I will read what it says.

Mr. BORAH. I remember the language, but when I read it, I did not get a clear idea of what was meant by the language.

Mr. SWANSON. It reads:

> In the event of an international agreement, which the President is requested to encourage, for the further limitation of naval armament, to which the United States is signatory, the President is hereby authorized and empowered to suspend in whole or in part any of the naval construction authorized under this act.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose the President should make an agreement, but the agreement had not been ratified—that is to say, the negotiating power had concluded his part of the work, but the Senate had not—would he be entitled to stop the building when he had completed the agreement?

Mr. SWANSON. I think the agreement possibly would have to be ratified by the Senate.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, under the Constitution, it is not an agreement of the United States until it is ratified.

Mr. SWANSON. That is true.

What is the trouble about this matter? Here we have all this talk when the Appropriations Committee itself has to make the appropriations as we progress under this bill. The bill does not say how fast the construction shall proceed; it does not say how much shall be appropriated in any one year; it does not say how rapidly the work shall be done. It is left to the Appropriations Committee and to Congress to determine the speed with which this construction shall be carried on.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. SWANSON. I am limited in time, Mr. President.

There is another objection to this proposed agreement: It is confined to Great Britain. Everybody knows that under the Washington conference the agreement was made on a ratio of 5 for the United States, 5 for Great Britain, and 3 for Japan. The United States could not have a limitation of armaments that would destroy that ratio of 5 to 3 for Japan. Why?

When this agreement of 5 for the United States to 3 for Japan was made, we agreed not to fortify Manila; we agreed not to fortify the Samoan Islands. We felt that with a ratio of 5 to 3 in naval strength the Japanese, on account of the proximity to their own territory, would be safe.

We felt that with a ratio of 5 to 3 the United States would be safe; and this agreement of 5–5–3 was made on the basis of an abandonment of naval bases which made each nation safe. Great Britain felt that in the western Pacific, on a ratio of 5 for herself and 3 for Japan, her possessions would be safe. Japan felt that her possessions would be safe with the limitations imposed on bases. If, however, this ratio is reduced from 5 to 3 the Philippine Islands will not be safe; America's possessions will not be safe.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SWANSON. No; the Senator can take his own time. I have only 10 minutes. The ratio of 5–5–3 will have to be continued with the three nations, and not with one nation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have not any time left on this amendment. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SWANSON. I have very little time, too.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the best way to accomplish results, the best way to proceed at all times, is to have the three nations—Japan, the United States, and Great Britain—extend that agreement to cruisers. If that is not done, we can not get any agreement. No other basis would be acceptable. Japan would not feel safe if the ratio of 5 to 3 were altered as far as she is concerned.

At the Washington conference it was felt that in American waters, in the eastern Pacific, and in the western Pacific, Great Britain and the United States each would be safe from offensive warfare against the other if the ratio of 5–5–3 was maintained. We ask the President to try again to get this limitation. In the meantime we can control by our appropriations the speed at which this navy shall be constructed. It will take seven years to complete it at the greatest speed that can be made; and it seems to me the wise thing to do is to let the provision stay in the bill as it is written. I hope the Senate will do that, because I believe that is the best way to accomplish the result desired by the Senator from Nebraska and by other Senators.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, now will the Senator yield?

Mr. SWANSON. I will.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not mean to say, does he, that any agreement entered into with Great Britain, if this amendment should become a law, would violate the conference agreement that was made here when the ratio was agreed to? Great Britain and the United States are both parties to that agreement.

Mr. SWANSON. But Japan is, too.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is arguing on the theory that they are going to violate another agreement.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, it is a multilateral agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but we are not going to violate it.

Mr. SWANSON. Do we want to meet and enter into a bilateral agreement that will nullify the other agreement as far as Japan is concerned?

Mr. NORRIS. They will not nullify it. It will not be interfered with in any way.

Mr. SWANSON. The only way the Government has of modifying, extending, or changing it is to get all parties together. It seems to me that is the right way.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Maine, in charge of the bill, if the committee acted upon the matter, whether the term "international agreement" used in the bill was understood to be synonymous with "treaty." It says "In the event of an international agreement, which the President is requested to encourage." Does that mean that there must be a treaty, and that the treaty must be ratified before it is an agreement?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not know that that was discussed in the committee. To just what does the Senator refer?

Mr. BORAH. It says "In the event of an international agreement," which seems to me to be a term distinguished from "treaty," or the committee would have said "In case of a treaty."

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think that there can be an international agreement that would not be in the nature of a treaty?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes; we make international agreements concerning some things, but I doubt, myself, if we can make an agreement which would be binding with reference to the Navy except in the form of a treaty, to be ratified by the Senate. What I do not understand is why that was not stated in the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the Executive can only make agreements which the Executive has full power and authority to make, under repeated decisions of the Supreme Court, within his province and power, and which bind him. He can make Executive agreements that do not require the consent of Congress. For instance, the President could make an agreement such as that President Wilson made at the time of the armistice as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

It seems to me this is a quibble. I am satisfied that if the President makes an agreement to limit armaments, no appropriation will be made until an opportunity is given to ratify it. I am satisfied that if the President makes an agreement to limit armaments and the building of ships the people will insist that it shall not take effect until it is found whether it is agreeable to the Senate or not.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator mean that if the President negotiates an agreement appropriations would stop—that the Senator would think they ought to stop until the agreement might be ratified?

Mr. SWANSON. They might be held up without any embarrassment; but I do not believe the President could make an agreement in relation to foreign affairs without the consent of the Senate, except as to such matters as are absolutely under Executive control.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I supposed.

Mr. SWANSON. If I remember, the Senator from Idaho has been a very earnest contestant for that principle.

Mr. BORAH. I am not taking any different position now.

Mr. SWANSON. If we were to pass a bill limiting the President in his exercise of Executive power, it would be contrary to the Constitution and would be null and void.

Mr. BORAH. What I was trying to find out was whether the committee had in mind something different from a treaty.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the committee took what was provided in the bill as it passed the House. I do not recall that as a committee we discussed this particular question.

Mr. BORAH. I assume that it means a treaty.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. As a member of the committee, I might say that, though we did not discuss the matter, as has just been stated, I read the bill as it came from the House, and I devoted some little attention to the paragraph mentioned and to the language referred to, "international agreement." I did not think, and I do not think now, that the President can enter into such an agreement as is there contemplated, and make it binding, without it being ratified by the Senate, and that would amount to a treaty.

Mr. BORAH. I assumed that that was the fact, but there has been plenty of discussion to the effect that whenever the President had finished his portion of the negotiations that would be considered an agreement for the purpose of delaying building.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the Senator will remember that appropriation bills do not provide that the President must spend the money appropriated on Monday, or Tuesday, this month, or that month. Appropriations are made to be expended within a particular fiscal year, and if a treaty is entered into I suppose it would be as it was before the Washington conference, the appropriation and expenditure of the money would be held up awaiting the action of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt that would be true in case of a treaty.

Mr. HALE. This says "to which the United States is signatory." I suppose that would be a solemn agreement in the form of a treaty.

Mr. BORAH. The United States is signatory to a treaty whenever the President signs it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But it does not become binding until ratified.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly not; and I am not debating that at all. I assumed that it meant a treaty, and that therefore it would not be considered as having been made until the Senate ratified it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is my understanding as to the meaning of that language.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Virginia if he considers the pending amendment as a violation of the naval alliance called the Washington agreement?

Mr. SWANSON. No; it is not a violation. It is asking us, when we have an agreement with three nations fixing a ratio of 5-5-3, to go and contract simply with one of the two, which I would not think would be very courteous or very agreeable to Japan. I think all three of the nations ought to be brought together.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I only wanted the Senator to yield long enough so that I could say that the Senator from Virginia, in his answer to the Senator from Minnesota, has entirely misinterpreted the amendment. It does not involve the violation of any agreement, there is no intention of violating any agreement, and it can not possibly be construed in that light.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Would the Senator from Nebraska consider an agreement composed of an alliance between the Governments of Great Britain and the United States?

Mr. NORRIS. No; there is no alliance provided in the amendment, as I read it. I do not think it is susceptible of that construction.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As I understand the amendment, it is left entirely to whatever the nations may agree on.

Mr. NORRIS. Not whatever we may agree on. It is confined to one thing, the building of cruisers. It is confined to this particular part of the bill, nothing else.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think there are substantial objections to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. I quite agree with him that the immediate cause of agitation in this matter is the rivalry between Great Britain and the United States in the construction of these particular cruisers. But it seems to me it would be quite futile to ask the President of the United States to endeavor to negotiate with Great Britain. I should think that Great Britain would be obliged to say, "We can not possibly do that, because we must, in regulating our own program, take into consideration the programs of the other countries." I dare say that Great Britain would say that she would not be able to negotiate upon that particular subject unless she likewise negotiated with France and Italy, if not with Japan. In other words, I would not agree to put up to Great Britain a proposal for a conference which, it seems to me, she must necessarily refuse to agree to.

In the second place, it seems to me that it would be quite improper, considering the courtesy we owe to Japan, to enter into an agreement with Great Britain. It will be remembered that Great Britain and France a short while ago entered into a tentative agreement concerning these matters which immediately provoked a storm of opposition, not only in this country but in other countries.

I can not think that any progress can be made by taking the matter up piecemeal in this way. The different branches of the service are so interrelated that it will be impossible, I think, to make any progress whatever by taking this matter up either with one country or with one single department of the entire naval establishment.

I agree with the Senator that that is the acute situation now, the rivalry between these two countries in the construction of cruisers, but I think it would be futile to ask Great Britain to enter into any such negotiations, and it would be quite improper, it seems to me, to enter upon negotiations of that kind without the participation of Japan.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, whatever the purpose of the amendment, its effect would be to put off the building of these cruisers. On yesterday afternoon the Senate took its position about these cruisers and decided that they should be built as soon as it is possible to build them. In no event, no matter what arrangements were made with England, would it be necessary to scrap any of these cruisers we are proposing to build, and I can see no advantage in putting off their construction.

I hope Senators will vote against the amendment.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a petition I have received from various citizens of Jefferson County, W. Va., with relation to the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PETITION TO THE SENATE

We, the undersigned citizens of Shepherdstown, Jefferson County, W. Va., believing that the ratification by the United States Senate of the general pact for the renunciation of war is a notable step toward the establishment of world peace, and believing also that the wholesome effect of this treaty upon the sentiment of nations and peoples will be largely nullified if the nation which first proposed it expresses lack of confidence in its efficacy by increasing its own armament, therefore urge the Senate of the United States to defer action on the pending cruiser bill and request our representatives in the Senate to use their efforts toward that end.

Mr. NEELY. I also ask that there be read from the desk a telegram I have received from the Ministerial Association of Charleston, W. Va.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The telegram was read, as follows:

CHARLESTON, W. VA., February 5, 1929.

Hon. M. M. NEELY:

It is the consensus of opinion of 45 ministers of the Charleston Ministerial Association that it would be wise to defeat the cruiser bill, in toto. But if the bill is passed, we would most respectfully plead that the time limit be stricken from the bill.

CHARLESTON MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION,
E. C. LEONHART, Secretary.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Nation for January 30, 1929, entitled "America and England," by J. Ramsay MacDonald.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Nation]

AMERICA AND ENGLAND

By J. Ramsay MacDonald

LONDON, January 10.—The relations between the United States and Great Britain grow increasingly unhappy. The usual committees of friendship are being formed—always an ominous sign—and the usual signals of a faith in doubt are being flown, such as: "War between the United States and Great Britain is unthinkable." When I hear that I am reminded of the sailor who in dire peril expressed a thankfulness that his religion was still left. The plain fact is that a spirit is growing up in the two countries which is estranging them, and is encouraging a kind of squabbling criticism which destroys mutual understanding and forbearance. It is very curious that the behavior of young creatures in nurseries so often illustrates that of nations toward each other. What each of our nations requires at this moment is a good, robust call from manly common sense.

One type of mind is peculiarly pernicious in such circumstances—that of the apostle of the inevitable. It has an alluring air of detachment, and yet of stoical submission to the decrees of Providence. To-day it murmurs as in a drowsy trance that great economic empires have always clashed and fought, that capitalist competition has always brought armaments competition, and that that in turn has always brought war. Therefore all that the United States and ourselves can do is to go on temporarily with our struggle for markets and rivalry for possession of furniture and old masters, and wait for the inevitable clash and crash decreed since the beginning of the world. Against this superstition and misreading of history every backboned sentiment of morality and common sense must be up in arms. Given governments which have minds to form rational policies, and a public opinion which represents an active will and is not merely a spill drifting upon the currents, war is no more inevitable than the smallpox, and the causes of war are just as controllable as insanitary conditions.

The European war left for the United States and England times full of petty irritation. The burdens of debt, revolutions in industry and in world markets, the problems of political readjustment in a world which has undergone more change than people really imagine, and, in some respects, the even more difficult mental readjustments that are called for, are not good for an equable temper. And when we come down to actual business we find ourselves still more immersed in the strangeness of the change which has taken place. The whole world to-day is calling for peace and security against war, and when a simple declaration against war which avoids every practical difficulty is put before the world, the world hails it with acclamation, signs it—and relapses. To those of us who believe that to bring the nations out of the war age is the divine task of this generation, the temptation to lapse into cynicism rather than continue in an energetic faith is very great when we find that armament expansion, both in Europe and America, has been decreed by the same hands and the same pens as signed a solemn bond to eliminate forever the consideration of war from national policies. There is something wrong somewhere. Somehow the distinction in Christian conduct between Sunday and the rest of the week seems to be creeping into international policies.

The first reflection which we are apt to make on such a situation is that some nation other than our own is perfidious. That has the demerit of leading us nowhere except up the dangerous way of self-appreciation and it also happens to be inadequate as an explanation. The fact is that every nation is rent between two opposing and hostile moods. Everyone wants peace, but no one will accept and pursue a policy based upon peace assumptions. The practical policy of the United States and Great Britain is exactly the same as that which preceded and prepared for the late war. Let us both get to close grips with reality. We have gone to Geneva to discuss naval armament, and we have both sent naval officers to do the negotiating. Both of us have begun with the assumption that war, involving our interests and safety, may break out. The duty of a naval officer is not to make peace but to safeguard his nation's interests in time of trouble, and both you and we have an admirably able and honest body of men to advise us on that matter. At Geneva it was not our mutual desire for peace that failed; it was not the impossibility of a peace policy that was demonstrated. It was a much simpler and very obvious thing. It was that in the event of a war which brought us into conflict with each other, or that brought us separately into the strife, the naval arm that the United States would require for security would not be the same as that which England would require for security; that, indeed, if either the United States or England thought of security in relation to the hostility of each other, both of us would have to increase rather than diminish our shipbuilding. That was all that the Geneva failure proved. Was it really worth while going to Geneva for that purpose? Admirals as naval negotiators could not do other than bring out that obvious fact, and their negotiations could only expose the obvious. Then English papers and American started their fusillades. They missed completely the reason for the failure, and in good old-fashioned style went for the other side hammer and tongs. You patted yourselves on the back, kicked us, and we did exactly the same on our part; and the Atlantic became broader far and more stormy for both of us.

Then came our military—not only naval—agreement with France. For that I have nothing to say except that it illustrates the bungling of so much of our present Government's foreign policy. I do not believe that it was directed against the United States. It was simply stupid. It sacrificed our own national interests far more than it menaced yours. The country, irrespective of party, rose up and, following the lead of the Labor Party, rejected it. It would be highly improper for me to pass any opinion on the new American cruiser program; if I did so, it would quite properly be resented. But I may be allowed, as an outsider who is greatly concerned with the moral authority which every great state must possess if we are to secure the conditions of a world's peace, to say that the execution of that program will be a great blow to the Nation from which the Kellogg pact originated. You may consider it necessary to face that, but, make no mistake, the result will be the same as though my country had not declined to countenance the Anglo-French agreement. People will say, "Oh, yes; they boast of their declaration denying that war is to be a consideration in national policy, and with a simultaneous voice vote for a larger navy," and if men can say that, it will be a bad thing for every movement seeking to establish a world peace.

Here in Europe those of us who are devoting our lives to the elimination of war from the national records of the times to come are nearer to the frontiers from which war alarms come than you are in America, and we, therefore, see phrases and words with a meaning in realistic policy somewhat different from the meaning you see in them. But we know that with America indifferent, or neutral, or pursuing its own way, our tasks are to be heavy and our defeat is to be more possible. Therefore it is imperative that steps be taken at once to end all this foolish and mischievous feeling which is alienating the United States from Great Britain.

The first thing to be done is to bring to a common table for discussion the reasons why ships are being built, why we both went to Geneva with the assumption we did, why we are thinking of trade routes being blocked, what there is between us that for immediate policy, newspaper writing, and political electioneering makes the Kellogg pact a mere collection of words strung upon a pious thread. The task of the statesmen is to make impossible the conditions upon which the masters of naval strategy spend their efforts. Why do not the statesmen act? If they are acting, why do they not give us comfort by informing us that they are? Is no attempt to be made; is none being made, to clear up the confusion of "the freedom of the seas"? Has neither of us the courage to discuss with the other what the interests and obligations of both are in, and to, the world and each other? Have both of us failed to observe how easy it is for nations to slip into war for nothing, how ready popular imagination is to be set on fire by anyone—even an almost anonymous newspaper proprietor—who cares to light a match? This is no case for private and unofficial action and conferences. The Governments must act. Both countries ought to appoint five or six of their most outstanding public men representative of the whole nation to meet and drag from the obscure corners of sulky suspicion the things which make difficulties between us. Let us know them. Mayhap fresh air would clean our minds of them. Governments are timorous, and if this be too solemn a proceeding for them to support, let them do something themselves, only we should like to be assured that they are aware of the mighty issues involved in a lack of real good will and confidence between the United States and Great Britain. No staging is too impressive for the importance of friendship between us, no pageantry too extravagant for the proclamation that difficulties have been removed. I want to involve the United States in no European escapade and no entanglements. It ought to praise its Creator night and day that that necessity is not imposed upon it, as it is, alas! upon us. But those of us whose lot is cast here, and whose fate it is to struggle against the powers of militarism which have been wounded but certainly not killed in the late war, should like to feel that an American hand will always be placed in ours for encouragement, and that the relations between your country and mine can be held up to the world as an example of what we are striving to establish everywhere.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I am not for war. No sane man is, but I could not help but wonder as I listened to the speeches here of some of the Senators what they might have been doing to-day if it had not been for the Revolutionary War. War is a horrible thing. I was in France in July and August, 1918. I followed our boys in the Chateau-Thierry drive. I was with Major Fuchs in Cohan, where white-hot shells were dropping in the streets and tearing buildings to ribbons, the town being shelled every 15 minutes.

I spent a night in Fere-en-Tardenois in the very cot in which the following night Doctor Dillon had both his legs broken by a shell. I was in the trenches where I savored the heavy white dust, the flies, the heat, and the scantiness of water; the smell of decaying flesh, where the human dominated the animal. I heard the mighty uproar of night attacks, where like heat lightning the barrage played along the sky; the boom of artillery and the burst of shell; the heavy rumble of trucks bringing troops, munitions, and supplies to the front; and ambulances setting out with the wounded. I have heard the carnage, the groans, the missiles screaming like demons in the air. I hate war with all the fervor of my soul. I was on the Mount Vernon the 5th of September, 1918, when she was torpedoed 250 miles off the coast of France. A hole 18 by 20 feet was torn in her side beneath the water level. I was there when her officers and men knew not what moment she would be going to the bottom. I felt the perfect discipline under fire of these men. I knew what it was to greet them one moment and the next to hear their dying groans, as their scorched and mangled bodies were brought into ship's bay. If it had not been for the wonderful courage and esprit de corps of Captain Dismukes and the men of that ship, I doubt if I would have been here to-day.

And the more that I hate war and all its horrors, the more it seems a cowardly crime for us men who have the security of the country in our hands to be deterred from our duty in seeing these brave boys given adequate support, giving them eyes in our airplane equipment, not sending them into battle blindfolded against an enemy that will surely have the latest and most adequate air equipment. To send them with antiquated or insufficient implements of war against our foes without adequate auxiliary ships and with obsolete guns, shorter ranged or behind in any particular, would be neglecting our sworn duty. The ships thus supplied would be doomed ships; the pride of our youth that we are training in our Army and Navy schools would be doomed youths, and the brave lads that volunteer as Uncle Sam's Army and Navy would be by us condemned to a fruitless sacrifice.

I want to be recorded as standing here ready to vote any money necessary to pay for the necessary equipment for our boys, either on land or on the sea. We do not want war, but if we must get into war, then, whether on land or whether on sea, we want them to have the best of everything in the world. They are entitled to it and we can give it to them. Why sit here and parley and parley and tease England?

Inadequate defense does not prevent war. Unpreparedness invites attack. We do not need to go back any further than the late war to see the costly folly of unpreparedness. Never had people been less expectant of war than when that world catastrophe broke upon us. Just before it happened statements were made by famous economists as to the improbability of civilization committing suicide by such means. But in spite of all opinion to the contrary, the war did break, and it found us all but handed over to the enemy by the idealist who refused to face facts, the unthinking pacifist, the professional peace advocate under pay of foreign interests, the noisy minority, the follower of slogans who adopts the quick opinion and the popular mob psychology. War is part of our history. Facts are more mighty than theory, and the fact is that war recurs about every generation.

No man in his sanity believes that unpreparedness for war will avert it. We alone of all nations are so fatuous as to express this belief. England's position, as expressed by Winston Churchill, is, "Nothing must lead you to abandon that naval supremacy upon which the life of our country depends." Italy just the other day agreed to a policy of naval expansion. Japan is building as rapidly as her means will let her, and France is using her reparations, not to pay us, but to enlarge her fighting equipment.

When I went to France I had a hope that some sort of a league of nations or world court would be a wonderful thing in the promotion of peace and the elimination of war. I had heard so often about sitting down around a table and thus securing the meeting of minds with the result there would be no need of war when all differences could be submitted to arbitration. I had only been there a couple of months of actual association with the people of Europe when I realized that there could be no meeting of minds with people who constantly looked for ulterior motives and were incapable of conceiving anyone doing anything for anybody else without immediate return. The idealism that is so prevalent in the United States is utterly lacking. Perhaps it is no wonder since we have had the great advantage of a government whose principal object is the development of the individual. Over there there is that sly something that always says one thing and means another that is foreign to Uncle Sam's blunt way of putting his cards on the table. We dredged their harbors, put in our hoisting machinery, built their railroads and warehouses, yet they charged us for ground to drill our soldiers on and England soaked us plenty for every soldier she brought over in her ships, from $90 to $150 per head. In France they even wanted to collect damages for the towns destroyed by our artillery in driving the enemy out.

I was in the Continental Hotel in Paris when delegates from the French Government came to me and put up to me the proposition that when I should return to the United States I should tell President Wilson that they feared the wonderful merchant marine and the navy we were then building and that it would make for better feeling if the President should give out the statement that at the close of the war we should divide that navy and that merchant marine with France. And then, Senators, we sit here and quibble about whether we should go ahead like common-sense folk and do our constitutional duty by giving our country the protection of an adequate, up-to-date navy.

There are over a million more men under arms in Europe to-day than at the beginning of the World War. Yet, in the face of all this bustle of preparation, we are adjured by visionaries to drop our arms, destroy our defenses, and wait till we are struck, then pull up paving stones and grab pitchforks. But in this modern age it takes time to build cruisers and train officers, and paving stones do not make much impression against long-range guns.

The Navy is a great fighting machine. It takes experts to understand its workings and its needs. It can not be built overnight nor can officers who can command from the bridge in a tempest or calmly direct their men in a submarine attack be developed from the raw in three months. Naval training can not be bought in market when you need it. Naval tactics can not be learned in a day. It is a matter of years.

With Europe a simmering cauldron of hatred—of racial enmity, with war constantly stalking on the horizon—with the world bristling with unsolved problems, conflicts of interests, it is useless to talk about world peace. Human nature remains what it is, subject to the same old hatreds and angers and misunderstandings and envies and jealousies. We have assumed responsibilities—we must give protection to our citizens, here and in foreign lands. We have doctrines that are worth defending. We have claims for loaned money, that we have already discounted fifty and more per cent, amounting to billions of dollars, that should be paid. Those who are armed have the final word in an argument. China has learned to her cost, and all the other nations know that it is navies and armies and not soft words that win the argument.

Human nature being what it is, no miracles can be expected. War may occur to-morrow. The Versailles treaty has in it the seeds of a hundred wars. Our wealth is the envy of the world. We are no longer isolated. From our disinterested gesture of entering the war in Europe, coupled with the unwise pledges and statements uttered by our war President, the nations of Europe have persuaded themselves that we are unalterably committed thereby. They are uneasy about their huge indebtedness. It is another instance of loan losing both itself and friend. They begin by hating the loan and end by hating us for being the innocent cause of their burden of debt. This burden is not going to grow any lighter. We have great wealth. We have immense international commerce, approximately $10,000,000,000 annually. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] said a moment ago that it was fourteen billion.

Our farmers, our laborers, our business men are all interested in this foreign trade. It is the lifeblood and prosperity of our Nation. That commerce must and shall be protected and the only way to have that protection is through the first arm of our defense—the Navy. We have cut our Army to 137,000. Compare this with the millions and millions under arms in Europe and you will get some idea of who is contemplating war.

If it were only the consideration of our great line of coast, our insular possessions, and our Panama Canal to do aught but provide for an adequate navy would make us the laughing-stock of Europe. We have not a first-class navy. Our Secretary of the Navy so testified. Not only that, but our merchant marine is second rate, out of date, and fast disappearing. Why, when the United States can not get the foreign powers to agree to limit their navies, should we, who have most to defend and are always the last to begin the fight, always the aggrieved, not the aggressor, be the first and doubtless the only one to perform hari-kari nationally?

Before we entered the World War, England was outraging our neutrality, as she always has done whenever it seemed best to her interest to do so, capturing and holding our merchant ships and classing everything as contraband. Our Secretary of State was protesting and protesting and protesting. It did no good, and had not Germany started in taking American lives without regard, instead of, as England was doing, taking American property, we probably must have come to grips with England.

But the outrage of destroying human lives of our nationals as compared with property confiscation finally decided us in favor of the Allies. Our part in that war cost us $50,000,000,000. We gave 125,000 American lives outright and the thousands upon thousands of wounded and otherwise injured that are to-day being compensated and cared for by our Government will undoubtedly run into other billions. We asked nothing and got nothing for our help in that war. England got one-third of the face of the world, France filled her pockets, Japan got her arms full, Italy filled her lap, and now they refer to us as Shylock because we ask them to pay, not the billions we loaned them during the war, but the money we loaned them since the war.

Oh, ingratitude, sharper than a serpent's tooth!

In 1922 we had the greatest navy in the world. A navy that could have prohibited competition if we had had sense enough to keep it.

That navy built and building, not alone for our own protection but for our allies, would have been sufficient to withstand the attack of any combination of nations, but in order to show the world that we sought no conquest war, to demonstrate our peaceful attitude, and in order to lead and show the way to reduction of armament, we offered to reduce our Navy to a parity with England and a ratio of 5-3 to the Japanese Navy. Very astutely on the part of other nations our offer was accepted as to capital ships, but owing to excellent diplomatic interference and play on the part of the nations in that conference for the pretended reduction of armament, it was decided that the reduction of cruisers and other auxiliaries could not at this particular time be decided upon, but at a later conference, no doubt, such reduction could be accomplished, and so a date was set for conference for such reduction. It was the old game of playing us for a soft mark, and we, with great sounding of trumpets, announced that navy disarmament and competitive navy building had been abolished, and we proceeded, in our usual confidence in others to carry out their implied contracts, to destroy 19 battleships, thus reducing our battleships to 18, while England carefully kept her 20. It seems to me that we have endeavored to please England long enough in this matter of the reduction of the Navy.

In all we destroyed cruisers and other auxiliaries laid down to the amount of about $500,000,000, while England, with a sly wink at Japan and France, tore up a copy of the contemplated plan for her battleship construction. We never did a more silly thing, for immediately the other nations began feverishly building auxiliary warships, cruisers, submarines, airplane carriers, and destroyers, and when the contemplated conference wherein we were to reduce the auxiliaries to the battleships was finally had, it was discovered there was nothing doing along the line of reduction. After second thought and carefully studying things over, England and Japan and France and Italy decided they could not stand for any limitation along this line. And, lo and behold! there was and there is no naval disarmament, and we are right back where we always have been and will continue to be until other nations change their attitude as to how to maintain peace. Our sworn duty, under the Constitution, as representatives of this Nation is to furnish an adequate navy for the Nation's protection, just as the cities must furnish adequate policemen for their protection, just as we must furnish adequate protection against fire, flood, and robbery.

Including the 15 cruisers this bill contemplates, we are still by a couple of hundred thousand tons behind England in modern cruisers and still in the arrears of Japan.

To-day Japan has twice our modern cruiser force and England over four times as many as we, all of which has been quietly built since the conference when they, with secret mental reservations for themselves, agreed for us to disarm.

We are a very poor third in naval strength. The secret understanding with France that was widely advertised some time ago might be taken into consideration. Also I have heard it spoken that the old alliance between Japan and England may yet secretly be in vogue. No one wants war, but I do claim that our Nation has a right to sleep of nights in security, and I do not believe that I would be doing my duty as a guardian of that Nation to leave it wide open to attack and holdup of any thug discerning our defenselessness to suddenly call "hands up."

After the asinine destruction of our Navy in 1922 we looked around to see how the nations of Europe would follow our altruistic and glorious renunciation for peace. Did they follow us? They did not. They smile at our simplicity. A nation of women they call us. Dupes, fools. The United States, though equipped with a navy to defend itself against the combined navies of the world, voluntarily fell back to Great Britain, immensely pleasing our former allies. That was fine. Just what they wanted. Poor old soft Uncle Sam.

And we have seen what our sacrifices and example and preaching have done. Folly for us to "lead the way in disarmament." Instead of equaling our sacrifice, England and Japan and France and Italy have exercised their self-given rights to proceed to build cruisers, destroyers, and submarines and airplane carriers and airplanes in great numbers.

History is prolific with instances of nations who ascended to their peak of power—of pride—of pomp and then were blotted out by their own arrogance, by their own shortsightedness in not seeing that once ascendency is attained it must be guarded and held. Countless nations since time began have had the peace bug. Soft words may turn away wrath, but not if the other fellow has a gun and is intent upon your pocketbook. England has constantly maintained her supremacy of the seas and has protected her commerce and her domain.

The United States has never even considered, until this wave of pacifism stressed it, letting other nations decide what is necessary for its best defense or what should be its internal policy. We have had a pride of country, we have lived here, we have raised our children here, and we have looked forward that this land should continue to be a place fit for our children to live in and love. But now there has crept in a spirit of apology, a fear of being misunderstood. What concern is it of ours whether what is for our best good is misunderstood or not? There is fear and hatred to be read in the eyes of nations all around us that yield only to superior force. We shall get our necessities, we shall keep our life as a nation only if we are master. All around are those who would leap and take. We must be able to keep them at bay. No householder leaves his doors open at night to prowlers. Every business man locks his doors and bars his windows, insures his stock, protects his equities against pilferage. And so with nations, for nations are composed merely of men.

Trade is the lifeblood of the country. When we sacrifice our business men, our laborers, our farmers to those of other nations we are bleeding our own veins and building up our foreign competitors. We must outgrow our fault of penalizing our business to the business advantage of foreign competitors, and we must likewise lay aside our toady attitude of worship of all that is not American and despite of all that is American.

The trouble is, we have taken in more of the ideas of our aliens than we have been able to digest. We have been diluted by alien influences, alien blood, and alien ideas. If we had kept our strain of hardy pioneers, our thinking would not have become thus cloudy, indiscriminating, and dishonest.

Different pacifists when testifying last year before the Naval Affairs Committee could not when pressed by questions say that they quite approved of the actions of George Washington or Patrick Henry. They would not go so far as to say that they would have acted as did Lincoln or Grant or any other of our loved and revered heroes, who made it possible that we have a country where such ultrafreedom of destructive and traitorous thought could even express itself. They openly state that they do not approve love of country, right or wrong, or necessity to loyally defend one's native land, to take her part against all the world, to feel that insults to our flag must be avenged. There is, they claim a newer doctrine and the new thing is internationalism.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Minnesota on the amendment has expired. The Senator has 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. SCHALL. I shall continue for a few minutes. The telegram just read into the RECORD by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], signed by a large array of doctors of divinity, urgently advised us to vote to leave our country unprotected.

When ministers of the gospel, educators, heads of women's organizations claiming to represent so-and-so, many people wire in to us in shoals of duplicate propaganda telegrams, "Do all in your power to defeat the present Navy program," what, in effect, are they counseling? They say, "Disregard the advice of the only people who know the science of protecting our country. Neglect your duty to the Nation and to the future Nation; prepare for irreparable disaster by hamstringing the fleet, while furnishing to other nations the opportunity, the desire, for stronger navies in our unprotected wealth, our rich argosies of commerce."

A storm of protest from the professional pacifists went up over the presence of the Secretary of the Navy during the House debate on this question. On technical questions this age of specialists demands the expert. You don't call in a horse doctor for a surgical operation, nor a chiropodist to treat the flu. These doctors of divinity are quite ready to make blanket assertions upon any and all subjects, though they could not possibly have technical knowledge of them. Naval officers, grown gray in the service, with a pride in that service that is traditional, a spirit that is stronger than life itself, are the men to give true counsel. Who has such sure and certain access to the facts? Who knows better the needs and condition of our Navy than its Secretary who is responsible for its well-being?

Our Secretary recommended, as a rebuilding program to supplant our obsolete ships, 29 cruisers, 5 airplane carriers, 32 submarines, 9 destroyer leaders; but foreign propaganda, working out through misguided but well-meaning citizens of our country, have caused such a pressure to be brought that the bill now stands for only 15 cruisers and 1 airplane carrier, and foreign propaganda would now have us dispense with even that.

I am only sorry that I have not a chance to vote for the full recommendation of our Secretary of the Navy. I gladly voted for the amendment of two more airplane carriers. I am of the opinion personally that our defense should consist of more and more and more airplanes and submarines, and personally I believe, though I may be in error, that too many airplane carriers can not be had as auxiliary to our naval defense. I am not for a paper navy. I am for a real, honest to God, actual navy, and I pray that if we ever get one again we will have sense enough to keep it until other nations show some tendency of disarmament.

To me our flag is but a meaningless thing unless it be mentally associated with all it represents. Our country means all there is of human freedom and human equality. It represents the highest degree of civilization to be found on earth. It is the most progressive. It has always promoted the freedom and development of the individual. It has brought out the highest ideals. I believe that just as Christ came to guide mankind so the Government of the United States, built upon the teachings of Christ, has been placed here by Divine Providence to guide the nations of the world. I believe that Christ's parable of the five foolish virgins and the five wise ones is applicable to us here and now. We should keep our light of freedom supplied with oil, trimmed, and burning. We should keep, through vigil of adequate preparedness, our light of liberty aloft. Christ taught that we are here to choose between good and evil. Shall we choose the path of nonresistance and allow the hope of the world to be sucked into the vortex of war and destruction? The United States, builded by a century and a half of patriotic toil, now covers her wounds with the noblest achievements ever recorded for the rights of man, born in travail, baptized in the blood of patriots, reared amid privations and hardships, conquering nature, mastering civil dissension, breathing forth love of humanity as illustrated in our treatment of Cuba and our unselfishness in the late World War, stands to-day the Samson of the nations. Shall we allow this beautiful Delilah vision to lop off our naval locks that our enemies may rush in and bind us, take our country, appropriate our wealth, destroy our civilization, and turn back the wheels of progress 150 years? Or shall our Nation continue to guide the nations of the world as Christ guides the conduct of mankind to "Peace on earth, good will to men"?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am for an adequate navy. I do not think this Government is doing more than it should do toward providing for the national defense. On a former occasion I took the position that the further building of battleships and cruisers should be held in abeyance until we could see what England and Japan and some of the other nations were going to do regarding the matter. We have waited, and instead of doing what I and others hoped they would do, they have gone on building more cruisers. Japan, as pointed out by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], has twice as many battle cruisers now in use as has the United States; England has many times more, and Germany and France are building more cruisers. Italy is, under the hand of Mussolini, the most dangerous tyrant in the Old World. The Kaiser was never as ambitious as is this man. Napoleon was never more ambitious than this tyrant called Mussolini. He is not only building a big navy but he is building a big army. Senators will recall that he has predicted that there will be another war in 1935, and that he would be ready for it. I trust that he is mistaken. I want this great peace-loving Nation of ours to use its power to promote peace in the world. It has done so in the past, it is doing so now, and I hope it will continue to do so in the future, but nearly all Senators will agree that it is our duty to have a Navy sufficient to protect our commerce upon the high seas. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that the great stabilizing peace forces in the world are the United States and Great Britain.

The mightiest forces for peace on earth are these two English-speaking nations. The idea of bringing together in an agreement to disarm these two English-speaking nations, and leaving all the outside world, all the other nations, to become an armed camp, if they want to, seems to me to be rather absurd.

Mr. President, I think all that can be accomplished along that line—and it is a good long step—will be accomplished by the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], which has already been adopted by the Senate looking to a reduction in sea armament generally. Section 4 of the bill provides that if the nations of the earth are in earnest and want to reduce armaments and cease the building of war equipment on the sea they have it in their power, and our President is urged to encourage such a movement. If such a consummation shall be reached, then the President may suspend the whole program of building cruisers in the United States or he may suspend it in part. We shall need some of these ships to keep our Navy up to what we feel it should be. We do not know when pirates may appear upon the high seas. Our rights have been challenged heretofore, and I want a navy sufficient——

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will yield in a moment. We need a navy sufficient to carry our flag with our cargoes of American products into all the ports of the earth. Jefferson was right. He said the sea should be as free to nations as the air we breathe is free to human beings.

It must be kept in mind that every year we send up and down and across the high seas $14,000,000,000 worth of commerce, and the life of American commerce depends upon it. Let me read just here what President Coolidge said in his message to Congress:

> Our Navy is likewise a weapon of defense. We have a foreign commerce and ocean lines of trade unsurpassed by any other country. We have outlying territory in the two great oceans and long stretches of seacoast studded with the richest cities in the world. We are responsible for the protection of a large population and the greatest treasure ever bestowed upon any people. We are charged with an international duty of defending the Panama Canal. To meet these responsibilities we need a very substantial sea armament. It needs aircraft development, which is being provided under the 5-year program. It needs submarines as soon as the department decides upon the best type of construction. It needs airplane carriers and a material addition to its force of cruisers.

Now I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Alabama has stated that the President is empowered to suspend the construction of these ships; but the contracts will be let. It cost us $25,000,000 to suspend the construction of the vessels begun before the Washington conference and thereafter scrapped. Why not take a lesson from that experience, and insert a provision in the bill that will give the President the right to delay the beginning of construction, so that there will be no necessity of paying damages for the cancellation of contracts which may have been let to shipbuilders of the country?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I think that provision is in section 4 of this bill, and I think that all the money that has been expended because of suspending the building of ships in the past, looking toward world peace, has been well spent. On the other hand, I want to tell the Senator from Iowa what I witnessed and what he also witnessed just a few years ago. When this Nation was drawn into the World War in 1917 we spent three thousand million dollars to build up a merchant marine and other instrumentalities of war in connection with it. If we had gone on and built our merchant ships in time of peace in an orderly fashion, it would not have cost half that amount.

I am not in favor of joining in a race with any other nation to see which one can build the most battleships and other naval equipment, but I am in favor of this Nation, without regard to any other nation, being able to defend itself and take care of its own business. I hold no ill will toward Great Britain; I am fond of Great Britain, the mother country; it is the greatest nation in the world outside of our own; and I want to see peaceful relations exist between us and that country always. Mr. President, we have put out of commission old cruisers which have served their time and have become obsolete; their places must be filled with up-to-date cruisers; and in the light of what Japan and France and Italy and Germany and England are doing the 15 cruisers provided for in this bill are not, I submit, very many for us to build. In order to safeguard our commerce upon the seas and to protect the people on the ocean fronts of the United States we have got to have an adequate navy, and I am in favor now, as I have always been, of an adequate navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAINE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. I understand that if he were present he would vote "nay." If I were privileged to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). Believing that my pair, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], would vote as I intend to vote on this question, I will vote "nay."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). I desire to state that my colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is necessarily absent from the Senate on account of illness.

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BRATTON (when Mr. LARRAZOLO's name was called). Repeating the announcement previously made with respect to the illness of my colleague [Mr. LARRAZOLO], I desire to say that if he were present he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. MCKELLAR (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] I vote "nay." If the Senator from Louisiana were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WHEELER (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]. If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay," and if I were permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. If present he would vote "nay."

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I wish to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] is absent on account of illness. If present and permitted to vote, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 9, nays 70, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. NORRIS was rejected.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, a short time ago the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] called attention to the language of section 4 of this bill, which refers to an international agreement for the further limitation of naval armaments, and he made a suggestion, which it seems to me ought not to be overlooked, when he asked whether that would be construed to mean a treaty or whether it might imply that an Executive agreement could be made to that effect.

It seems to me that the language in line 23 of page 2 of the bill, where reference is made to an international agreement, must be construed in connection with the language of section 3, where it speaks of "the treaty limiting naval armament," which, of course, is the proper designation of the Washington conference treaty.

I take it, however, that every Senator is agreed that the advice and consent of the Senate is a prerequisite to the validity of any international agreement for the limitation of armament that may hereafter be made. I take it that every Senator is agreed that the advice and consent of the Senate should be had before any such agreement should become effective, and, from what the chairman of the committee has stated, it seems that there was never any other intention in the mind of any member of the committee. Therefore, thinking that it is the unanimous view of the Senate that the words "international agreement" in line 23 mean "treaty," I ask unanimous consent that the words "an international agreement" in line 23 of page 2 may be stricken out and the words "a treaty" substituted therefor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I shall object to that. I object to it because I want to give the President——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. With a view of expedition, to hurry matters along, I wish to inquire whether either the Senator from Pennsylvania or the Senator from Montana has not spoken on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Neither Senator has spoken on the bill. The time is being kept in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have no doubt that the construction given to this language by the Senator from Pennsylvania is absolutely correct—that the "international agreement" referred to means a treaty—a treaty which, in order to be effective, shall be ratified by the Senate. I hope, however, that a different construction will be given to it, and that the President of the United States, after he has negotiated the treaty and signed it, may then suspend action under this bill and not be tied down so that he can not suspend it until after the treaty shall have been ratified by the Senate.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If the Senator feels that way he will, of course, object to my request for consent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In other words, I want the President, as soon as he negotiates a treaty, if the work is in progress, to suspend the construction until the Senate either rejects or ratifies the treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent proposal made by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Then, Mr. President, speaking of the bill, I desire to say that for myself—and I believe I speak for a great majority of the Senators—I think it would be in the highest degree unfortunate were these words to be construed to be an invitation to the President to negotiate without the advice and consent of the Senate any treaty of naval disarmament.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I trust the Senator will not think that I was suggesting anything of the kind. Of course, a treaty for naval disarmament must be ratified by the Senate. The question is simply as to the stage of the proceedings at which the power of the President to suspend shall arise.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I understand the Senator. The Senator would give effect to a negotiated treaty by suspending operations before that treaty actually became the consummated obligation of the parties to it. It is such a construction as that that it seems to me would be in the highest degree unfortunate, because if the President may regard his negotiated treaty as in effect for the purpose of changing the naval policy of the United States, regardless of what action the Senate may have taken upon it or regardless of what inaction the Senate may have displayed, practically that treaty would be in effect without the acquiescence of the Senate; and we have seen too many cases in our history where a President solicitous for carrying out some particular policy has undertaken to thwart the real intention of our people as it has been expressed in the Senate.

Mr. MCMASTER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert, at the end of the bill, the following new section:

SEC. 6. (a) Upon declaration of war by the Congress at any time hereafter, the following persons shall forthwith be drafted into the military or naval service of the United States, to serve in the zone of actual hostilities for the duration thereof:

(1) Every male person under the age of 55 years who, upon such declaration of war, is a Member of either House of Congress or who, within one month prior to such declaration, has resigned from membership in either House.

(2) Every citizen of the United States or a possession of the United States, over the age of 30 years and under the age of 55 years who is or at any time within one month prior to the declaration of war has been the beneficial owner of property equal in value to $5,000,000 or more.

(3) Every citizen of the United States or a possession of the United States, over the age of 30 years and under the age of 55 years who is or at any time within one month prior to the declaration of war has been a member of a partnership with total assets, including individual property of the partners liable for partnership debts, equal in value to $5,000,000 or more.

(4) The chief executive of every corporation organized within the United States and its Territories and possessions, with a subscribed capital stock and surplus of $5,000,000 or more, if such chief executive is a male citizen of the United States or a possession of the United States and under the age of 55 years, and, otherwise, the male citizen of the United States or a possession of the United States under the age of 55 years who is next in line of succession to the duties of the office of chief executive.

(5) The 10 other male citizens of the United States or a possession of the United States over the age of 30 years and under the age of 55 years who are the beneficial owners of the largest amounts of stock in each such corporation. If in order to define any such group of 10 stockholders it is necessary to choose between male citizens between such ages owning the same amount of stock, the choice between such individuals shall be of the youngest. Persons within this group shall be selected on the basis of stock ownership as of one month prior to the declaration of war.

(b) If any person is found to be within more than one of the classifications of subdivision (a) of this section he shall be drafted as a person within whichever one of such classifications is first enumerated in such subdivision, or if he is within classification (4) or (5) as an officer or stockholder of more than one corporation, he shall be drafted as an officer or stockholder of the corporation of which he owns the largest amount of capital stock; and he shall be disregarded in determining the representatives of all other classifications and corporations. No person unfit to perform any service, combatant or noncombatant, shall be counted in determining representation of corporations.

(c) When after a declaration of war the value of the property of any individual or the assets of any partnership, as defined in subdivision (a) of this section, reaches the amount of $5,000,000, such individual or the members of such partnership shall be forthwith drafted into the military or naval service of the United States. When after a declaration of war the subscribed capital stock and surplus of any corporation, organized theretofore or thereafter, reaches the amount of $5,000,000, an officer and 10 stockholders selected as in paragraphs (4) and (5) of subdivision (a) of this section, on the basis of stock ownership as of the date on which the subscribed capital stock reaches such amount, shall be forthwith drafted into the military or naval service of the United States.

(d) The President is authorized to provide by regulation for the expeditious assignment of the persons so drafted to active military or naval service within the zone of actual hostilities. Such assignment shall be to the branches and grades of the service for which such persons are qualified. All such persons shall be assigned to combatant service except those who are unfit therefor and those who are members of well-recognized religious sects or organizations, the existing creeds and principles of which forbid their members to participate in war, and whose convictions are in accord with such creeds and principles; but no person shall be exempted from noncombatant service for any disability or other reason if he can consistently with the interests of the service be employed in any capacity with the military or naval forces in the zone of actual hostilities. No person shall be discharged from service under this section prior to the cessation of actual hostilities except for disability to perform any service under this section.

(e) Persons subject to the provisions of this section who are in the military or naval service of the United States shall be counted in determining the membership of the classes subject to this section and shall continue in such service but shall be assigned to active duty in the zone of actual hostilities at the earliest possible moment, and shall not be discharged or retired from active service prior to the cessation of hostilities except for disability to perform any service.

(f) It is declared to be the policy of the Congress that every Member of either House drafted into the military or naval service under this section shall immediately resign his office of Senator or Representative. No Member so drafted shall receive any compensation for his services as Member for the remainder of his term.

(g) The President is authorized to provide by regulation for the ascertainment of persons subject to this section, and for the execution of all provisions of this section.

(h) Any person violating any regulation made in pursuance of this section or attempting in any way to evade service or to aid any other person to evade service under this section shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 and by imprisonment for not more than five years nor less than three years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, after line 8, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 6. That hereafter it shall be unlawful to fly any flag or pennant on the same staff, or hoist above the flag of the United States of America, or colors representing the same, on any battleship, cruiser, or other vessel in the naval service of the United States. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to see that this provision is observed, and he is hereby directed to notify the commanding officers of all vessels under his jurisdiction of the provisions of this section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

THE AMERICAN FLAG

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, demand for this legislation comes from every State in the Union. Just a few months ago a hearing was held before the House Judiciary Committee for the purpose of adopting a flag code for the United States. Garland W. Powell, who was chairman of the National Flag Conference held in Washington, appeared before that committee; and, speaking for that conference and for the American Legion, he indorsed the proposed flag code of the United States. The flag code indorsed by Mr. Powell had this provision in it, "No emblem, flag, or pennant shall be hoisted above the flag of the United States."

Capt. Thomas T. Craven, Director of Naval Aviation, United States Navy, appeared before the committee representing the Secretary of the Navy. He stated to the committee that a provision of the flag code provided for flying the church pennant at another place rather than over the Stars and Stripes. And he expressed his willingness and that of the Navy to comply with the requirements of the United States flag code.

Let me read you what he said:

I might mention that there are two things which the Navy will have to change with regard to its practice. One is that in the Navy we fly the church pennant over the flag when we hold services. In accordance with this measure, we would change that and fly the church pennant in another place.

I have a letter from Gridley Adams, chairman of the National Flag Code Committee of the United States, in which he says:

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y., January 22, 1929.

MY DEAR SENATOR HEFLIN: It is with much pleasure I note your intended amendment to H. R. 11526, to the effect that it shall be unlawful to fly any flag or pennant above the flag of the United States of America on any battleship, cruiser, or other vessel in the naval service of the United States. And, as chairman of the National Flag Code Committee, representing over 100 patriotic societies that adopted the new flag code for the guidance of civilians, I know I am expressing the desire of every one of the several million members of these societies.

Upon my committee are the representatives of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War, ordered by their respective Secretaries to represent them and their branches of the Government of the United States at the conferences which were held for the purposes of formulating the new flag code.

* * * At a recent hearing before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives the representative of the Navy at that hearing expressed the willingness of his department to do away with this custom (of placing the church pennant above the United States flag) in deference to general adverse opinions of the overwhelming majority of patriotic societies that are subscribers to the new flag code.

* * * * * * *

With every earnest wish that you will succeed in getting your amendment accepted, believe me,

Right truly yours,

GRIDLEY ADAMS,
Chairman National Flag Code Committee.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. I simply wish to ask the Senator what church flags, in point of fact, are flown above our national flag on our ships.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator recalls that I had a resolution pending here at the last session seeking to prevent the flying of any flag or church pennant above the flag of the United States, suggesting that they be flown elsewhere on the ship at a high and prominent point.

Mr. BRUCE. Are any church flags, except the Catholic flag, ever flown above our national flag on our ships?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know that any one has been flown above it except the Roman Catholic flag which I exhibited here last spring.

Mr. President, I have been diverted by the Senator from Maryland. From time immemorial groups, tribes, and nations of people have had a flag to distinguish them from other groups, tribes, and nations. Their flag represented the sentiment, soul, and the purpose of those who treasured it and safeguarded it in time of peace and fought to sustain it in time of war.

Early in the struggle for American independence the cry went up from patriots everywhere for a flag that would appropriately represent the thirteen Colonies in their struggle for liberty. Some suggested that the flag should bear the image of a ferocious beast or a dragon, but, ah, no, no beast of prey, no serpent that hissed by the way, could represent the thought and purpose, the ideals, and soul yearning of those who had staked their all in the cause of liberty.

In that critical hour Washington heard a voice saying "Look up," and he lifted his eyes toward the skyland. God gave him a glimpse of heavenly blue, of rainbow bars and golden stars. Washington sketched the vision and Betsy Ross made the Stars and Stripes.

It was kissed by the winds of God, christened by the sunlight of heaven, and encircled by a halo of glory as Washington proclaimed it the banner of American liberty and battle flag of a patriot army.

Mr. President, the world looked on and listened when John Paul Jones unfurled it on the Ranger and the sea caught a glimpse of its glory as it proclaimed to the earth the American doctrine of the free seas.

Born in the cause of liberty
More'n a hundred years ago,
In that same cause it stands unfurled,
With every star aglow.

It's the flag that Washington loved dearly,
It's the banner his comrades bore
In their struggle for American rights
In the trying days of yore.

We can hear their voices calling,
As we see that flag unfurled,
Saying, "Love it and exalt it
As you wave it to the world."

Mr. President, only one time in its history has the veil been rent in the temple of its national authority. That was when the question of the right of a State to withdraw from the Union seemingly could not be settled in the halls of peace and was submitted to the arbitrament of the sword. Arrayed on opposing sides in that conflict were as brave and conscientious men as ever shouldered gun or drew a battle blade. They were settling a question that had to be settled before the indisputable status of the Union could be finally and forever fixed.

Hope's precious pearl in sorrow's cup,
Unmelted at the bottom lay,
To shine again when all drunk up,
And the bitterness should pass away.

Mr. President, with the mingled blood of brothers North and South they cemented the sections in the bonds of an everlasting union, with one flag, one country, America incarnated spirit of liberty.

God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform.

When our country was drawn into war with Spain, I saw Fitzhugh Lee and Gen. Joe Wheeler, of Confederate fame, Frederick Grant and General Shafter, of the Union Army, comrades in arms under the Stars and Stripes. I saw the sons of those who had worn the blue and the sons of those who had worn the gray beat back the Spanish forces and plant that flag in victory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator on the amendment has expired. He has 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Later on, Mr. President, when the countries across the seas were trembling beneath the tread of war's mighty armies, and the liberty of the world was at stake, I saw the sons of those who had followed Grant and the sons of those who had followed Lee take that flag across the sea and carry it to victory on the battle front in France.

An American poet caught the spirit of that occasion when he beautifully said:

Here's to the Blue of the windswept North,
When you meet on the fields of France,
May the spirit of Grant be with you all,
As the sons of the North advance.

And here's to the Gray of the sun-kissed South,
When you meet on the fields of France,
May the spirit of Lee be with you all,
As the sons of the South advance.

And here's to the Blue and Gray as one,
When we meet on the fields of France,
May the spirit of God be with us all,
As the sons of the flag advance.

Mr. President, Old Glory is the symbol of our national sovereignty, emblem of free constitutional government, and ensign of a nation's strength and solidarity.

That flag represents the best that there is in human government. It stands for principles without which no republic can last, and in the loss of which human liberty can not endure.

Its white stripes represent the purity of its purpose and the justice of its cause. Its red stripes represent the shed blood of those whose valor and heroism brought it into being. Its blue, like a scrap of midnight heaven, blossoms with stars.

Flag of the free heart's hope and home,
By angel hands to valor given,
Thy stars have lit the welkin dome,
And all thy hues were born in heaven.

Star-Spangled Banner,
O, long may it wave,
O'er the land of the free
And the home of the brave.

No flag should fly above it
On either land or sea,
It should be first and uppermost,
And henceforth it shall ever be.

Mr. President, I ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have taken up with the Navy Department the amendment offered by the Senator, and they are entirely willing to see it enacted into law. Therefore I accept the amendment.

I would like to say, however, that on the second line of the amendment there are two errors in punctuation, and I ask unanimous consent that they be corrected, that the two commas on the second line, one after the word "staff" and the other after the word "above," be stricken out. Otherwise the entire meaning of the amendment would be lost.

Mr. HEFLIN. I consent to that change.

Mr. BRUCE and Mr. REED of Pennsylvania addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Can an amendment be agreed to while Senators are seeking an opportunity to be heard upon it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has not been agreed to. The Senator from Maine has accepted it, but it still must be voted on by the Senate.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, when this proposal was made last spring I had something to say with respect to it; indeed, I had not a little to say with respect to it at that time. I feel, therefore, that it is altogether unnecessary for me now merely to repeat what I said then.

As I understand it, there is but one church flag that is ever hoisted above our national flag. That was the statement of the Senator from Alabama. If that impression of mine is erroneous, I would like to have it corrected, because then my views about this proposal might assume a very different form from that which they have assumed.

Mr. GERRY rose.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator from Rhode Island perhaps was not in the Chamber when I asked the Senator from Alabama whether any church flag was ever hoisted above the flag of the United States.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, my recollection is that the Navy flies a church flag when divine service is held on board ship. The Senator from Maine can correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is correct, and I am suggesting that they fly it somewhere else. I do not see any necessity for pulling the Stars and Stripes down to make room for anybody's flag above it. I want it to be first.

Mr. BRUCE. I understand that the flag which is flown above our national flag at times on our ships is a sectarian flag.

Mr. GERRY. Oh, no; not at all. Whenever divine services are held on board a battleship they fly the church flag over the national flag on the theory that God is over the Nation and over the Navy.

Mr. BRUCE. That is more than a theory. What sort of flag is that? Is it a naval flag pure and simple?

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Maryland knows that the flag I displayed here last summer was a flag with a cross on it, flying above the Stars and Stripes on the battleship Florida and on the battleship Cincinnati.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; and the Senator objected to it then, either because it was a Catholic flag or because it closely resembled the Catholic Church flag.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, I am suggesting that the emblem, whatever it is, be flown at another place and not above the flag of our country.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; but no emblem is flown, as I said, an emblem that happens to be, for all substantial purposes at any rate, the Catholic Church flag.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator wants me to go on record on that subject I am ready to do it. I do not want the Catholic flag flying over it and I am not going to permit it if I can help it.

Mr. BRUCE. Exactly, and I venture to say that if the proposal were traced to its origin, that origin would be found to be the Ku-Klux Klan.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Ku-Klux Klan and nobody in it ever suggested anything to me about it. I did it myself. Because the Senator gets his inspiration from the Knights of Columbus, he should not think I get mine from the Ku-Klux Klan.

Mr. BRUCE. I get my inspiration from the collective influence of all Christian sects including the Catholic Church. So far as I am concerned, any appeal to me based on sectarian discrimination and prejudice never reaches my heart under any condition.

Yes; that is the origin of the suggestion. It can be traced back without the slightest difficulty to that perennial fountain of mean proscription, bigotry, and hatred.

Now, so far as sectarian bigotry is concerned, I am one of the recent sufferers from it. As everybody knows, my defeat in the State of Maryland is due to the recrudescence of sectarian prejudice, a thing which had not been deemed even to be possible. But I do not cherish the slightest personal resentment on that account. In my public life I am prepared to accept the fortunes of war in whatever form they come to me or whatever may be the influences that make them bear with particular severity upon me. But as long as I am a representative of a State in which one-fourth of the church population is Catholic, I shall protest, and protest with all the energy and indignation of which my nature is capable, against a proposal inspired, as I conceive it, by such a narrow-minded, bigoted aim as that which lies back of this amendment. God knows that a sufficiently bitter pool of Marah has already been created in the Commonwealth in which I live, by sectarian hatred and animosities, and the pending proposal tends to make the waters of that pool still more bitter.

I do not hesitate to say that a measure of sectarian animosity has been aroused at the last election in the breasts of the people of Maryland by such clerical firebrands as Bishop Cannon and others which can not reasonably be expected to die down for 10 years to come. Our people fondly supposed that if there was a tolerant community in the world, that community was Maryland, the community which in its origin had been a Catholic community and in which from generation to generation, with the exception of a single brief interval or so, the spirit of religious tolerance had prevailed. Now there is, I see, a proposition to award some sort of recompense to Bishop Cannon as having made the most significant contribution made by any individual during the past year to religious progress. I say that if a recompense of any sort shall be made to him for his political activities during the last 12 months it should be in the form of a recompense to him for having made the most significant contribution to religious retrogression.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Maryland has expired.

Mr. BRUCE. I hope that the Senate will not permit this stigma to be placed upon one of our Christian churches.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I do not rise to oppose the pending amendment, but I must speak now as I have already spoken on the bill.

A short time ago I asked unanimous consent to be permitted to offer an amendment merely changing the words "international agreement" to read "a treaty," and I then understood that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] objected to the amendment being offered; but I have since talked with him and am satisfied that he does not object to it being offered by unanimous consent, but merely objects or will object to the adoption of the amendment when the question shall be put.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to ask unanimous consent that the words "international agreement" be changed.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The fault was mine because of the way I worded my original request. Therefore, I now renew the request that the amendment be considered as pending, to be acted upon after the present pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BRUCE. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, the Navy flies during divine service, if I am correctly informed, what is known as the church flag. This flag is not a denominational flag. It is flown by the Navy out of respect for divine services and out of respect for Almighty God. It is the Navy's tribute. For that reason it has been the custom from time immemorial in the American Navy to have that flag flown over the flag of the United States, the only flag so flown. It is the recognition that God is over all.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was temporarily called from the Chamber. I should like to have read the amendment which the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] accepted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, after line 8, insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 6. That hereafter it shall be unlawful to fly any flag or pennant on the same staff, or hoist above, the flag of the United States of America, or colors representing the same, on any battleship, cruiser, or other vessel in the naval service of the United States. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to see that this provision is observed, and he is hereby directed to notify the commanding officers of all vessels under his jurisdiction of the provisions of this section.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the flag code which has been adopted and indorsed by the American Legion and other patriotic orders has this provision in it:

Do not display any object or emblem of any kind on or above the flag of the United States of America.

Captain Craven came before the committee, representing the Navy Department and the Secretary of the Navy, and said they were willing to change its custom and fly this pennant at another place. I have had probably 500 letters about this matter from all over the United States from time to time requesting that this be done. There is no objection to the church pennant being flown, but there is no reason for lowering our flag to put any emblem or pennant above it. That is the position I take, and I think the Senate will support me.

Mr. BORAH. The amendment in and of itself perhaps is not objectionable, but I think in view of the debate it is very objectionable.

Mr. HEFLIN. I hope before the Senator takes his seat that he will permit me to say that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] injected whatever religious discussion there has been about the question. I never mentioned it in any way at all. The Senator from Maryland saw fit to inject it here, and I trust that there will be enough red-blooded, upstanding Americans in this body on the roll call to vote for the amendment. All I ask is a roll call on it.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think the color of the blood is involved.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has given expression to a thought that has been in my mind during this debate. The amendment itself is very innocent in appearance, but the debate has raised the question as to whether or not we are now going on record in favor of lowering the emblem of the highest authority in the world, the authority above all nations, a recognition of the God of Nations. The practice of the Navy of the United States it appears has been that of displaying an emblem of religion, not any one but all religions, during divine services in the Navy with the purpose and intention of calling to the attention of the enlisted men and officers of the Navy of the existence of a Supreme Being, a higher authority than human authority, a God of nations as well as a God of individuals, who represents supreme authority in the world.

I, for one, refuse to go on record as in favor of hauling down the emblem or ensign that recognizes the authority of God, and substituting the flag of our Nation that we all love and respect and are proud of above the pennant that symbolizes God. It is not creditable to the American people or the Senate to have a record vote here on the question of repudiating the long-continued practice of this country to recognize the Creator of the world above every other human sentiment.

From the very earliest days of the founding of our Government the word of God, respect for God, reverence for God, and love for God have been paramount and an inspiration to all our people, regardless of their religious sect. We have proudly placed God first and country next. Now it is proposed to place country above God.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I shall yield to the Senator in just a moment.

In my own Commonwealth of Massachusetts there is not a public assembly begun or ended, in the legislature, in the courts, without a prayer, "God save the Commonwealth of Massachusetts," a custom that came down from the old Pilgrims, a custom that the children of the immigrants, whatever their religion may be, have followed and loved to practice. Indeed, the celebrated covenant of the Pilgrim Fathers began with the prayer "In the name of God." Our people are a religious people.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will yield in just a moment.

Mr. GERRY. I merely wish to observe that the legend "In God we trust" appears on our coins.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is true, and is another evidence of our recognition of a Supreme Being and our trust in Him.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I now yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. I want to remind the Senator that, if I am correctly informed, it is only during the hour of prayer, the hour dedicated to our Captain, Christ, that the church pennant is hoisted.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. During divine service we raise not a flag but a pennant to remind all of the worship of God. Mr. President, it is regrettable that an issue of this kind should have been raised, and I should have remained silent and said nothing had it not been that the debate has taken the appearance of an entirely different motive and purpose than would apparently appear to one who simply read the amendment. The issue now is, Will we repudiate the recognition in the Navy of a power and influence above all nations and all sects—a Supreme Being?

I want to repeat, Mr. President, that I refuse to put even the flag of my country or the authority of my country above the emblem of God, and above the authority of God, and I want my country to continue to teach its children, in the service of the Government and out of the service of the Government, that we are a God-believing people; that we love God; that we revere Him; that we pray to Him; that we ask His intercession; that we need His guidance. Indeed, our prosperity, our progress, and our greatness as a Nation have been due largely to the confidence placed and to the intercession and pleadings of our people of all religions for His guidance and direction. I protest against intolerance assuming the proportions of an insult to the God of nations.

I for one refuse to depart from the time-honored American custom of placing the emblem of God above every other emblem in the world. I will not haul down the pennant of God for any other emblem. I insist that we still preserve the sublime and ancient American custom of recognizing God as the source of all patriotism, of all our blessings. I insist that we still adhere to the American prayer that embraces all creeds and sects, "In God we trust." The pennant that the Navy has displayed is the pennant symbolical of the God of the New and the Old Testaments—the God of the religion that grips the hearts of all human beings regardless of creed or sect. Let us refuse to deny our first act of recognition or of worship or of reverence to the Creator of all we possess.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama can not now be recognized under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I ask that the Senator from Alabama may be recognized.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask unanimous consent that I may address the Senate for 10 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Alabama is recognized for 10 minutes.

THE UNITED STATES FLAG

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland has, in his opposition to this amendment, deliberately injected the Catholic question. I did not do it. He must have been inspired by his Knights of Columbus friends to do what he has done. Is it strange that the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Massachusetts make their speeches under the circumstances? I offer no offense to those who worship the God of the Universe above everything. I try to do that myself; but when we refuse to pull the American flag down on its staff upon a battleship in order to hoist the Roman Catholic flag or pennant above it, I do not think that we are showing any disrespect for Almighty God, because I do not think that Almighty God had anything to do with putting that flag above the American flag in the first place. The way to worship God is with an humble and a contrite heart, by good deeds done and not by outward show in the display of certain pennants and emblems.

I am not objecting to the flying of a church pennant when we have religious services on our battleships, but I am objecting to the pulling down of the American flag and hoisting any other flag or pennant above it. Senators, why should that be done?

It has been a custom in our Navy, and the Navy is ready to abandon it and the American people want it abandoned. I have not the time to tell you now who it is that is determined to prevent the change of that un-American custom, but it is the Roman cross that flies above our flag. If that were not so, why do they and they alone object to flying it somewhere else on the ship? Where Roman Catholic chaplains are in charge many papers have carried a picture of it, saying, "This is the only flag that flies above the Stars and Stripes." Mr. President, when the Roman pennant is flown now they pull down the Stars and Stripes in order to fly that pennant at the top of the pole. Think of that!

The chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee has expressed his willingness to accept my amendment and the Navy Department has expressed its willingness to comply with this provision, which is in keeping with the provision of the United States flag code approved by the American Legion and millions of other real patriotic Americans. What is the trouble here? Whence comes this opposition to this particular amendment which honors and exalts our American flag?

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I have not the time; I am sorry.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator is speaking by unanimous consent, and I merely wanted to correct a statement he has made. He says it is the Roman flag. It is St. George's cross that is on that flag, and it is taken from the flag used in the British Navy.

Mr. HEFLIN. I brought, Mr. President, before an assembly the Italian flag, and the only difference between that flag and the church pennant flown by the Navy is the Pope's crown, which is on the Italian flag; the church pennant is just like the other part of that flag.

Now, why does the Senator from New England [Mr. GERRY] object when the Navy itself has consented to having this change made? Why do the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Maryland object when the American Legion indorses this change, and what I am proposing to do is in keeping with one of the provisions of the flag code.

Mr. GERRY. I objected to the Senator from Alabama making an incorrect statement.

Mr. HEFLIN. O Mr. President, the Senator thinks it is incorrect; but it is not. Let him have his own view about it. The Senator from Maryland does not owe his defeat to anybody's bigotry; he owes it to the onward march of the people of his State, who are tired of seeing the wet advocacy which the Senator has indulged in since he has been here. When I assailed the Catholic program to plunge this country into war with Mexico the Senator came to their rescue.

I predicted that Senator BRUCE would be defeated; that he would never come back, and the people of his State have taken him out. The people of Maryland gave him his seat; the people of Maryland have taken him out of that seat; blessed be the name of the people of Maryland. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore rapped with his gavel.

Mr. BRUCE. I will say, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am the author of the amendment, and have only a few minutes to say what I would like to say.

Mr. BRUCE. I know the Senator has no time except that which he has by virtue of my generosity, and now his true moral quality comes out when he uses the time thus generously given to him in such foul and vituperative abuse.

Mr. HEFLIN. No. I resent that statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wants to call the attention of both Senators who have just spoken to the second paragraph of Rule XIX:

> No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I should like to yield to the Senator, because I should like to debate with him at length, but I can not in the little time I have yield to him now. I do wish, however, the American people to know that to-day we have an issue right here that tests the real American situation in this body. Why, I ask the Senate and patriotic Americans everywhere, should the American flag be lowered to make room for any foreign potentate's pennant or flag? Can we not fly a church pennant somewhere else on a high pole indicating that religious service is being held? I am in favor of that. Why do certain Senators object to changing this particular custom when the Secretary of the Navy has expressed his willingness to have it done? When the representative of the American Legion wants it done, when Gridley Adams, speaking for the Flag Code Commission of the United States, wants it done, when 126 patriotic orders of loyal American men and women want it done, and when an overwhelming majority of American citizens want it done, why should we as American Senators refuse to have it done? Mr. President, why should not the Stars and Stripes fly proudly and majestically at the top of a staff all its own? It represents the Government of the United States.

Then fly the church pennant at another place and you carry out the idea of the Christ when he said, "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and unto God the things that are God's." There is where you get your idea of the separation of church and state. Our Supreme Court has declared this to be a Christian Nation. We believe in God; we put on our coins the words "In God we trust"; but do not let us be deceived into thinking that we have to pull down the American flag in order to approach a throne of grace in order to worship God.

Senators, are you going to permit the speech of the Senator from Maryland and the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and those they have spoken for influence your vote? I must say that it is exceedingly unfortunate that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], himself a Roman Catholic, should have spoken as he did and at the time he did—exceedingly unfortunate. We have a right in America to do what we please toward honoring and protecting our flag, and the American people are going to see to it that it is properly cared for in the American way.

That flag means wherever it flies that it represents a people that trusts in God. It is God's greatest agency on the earth, and wherever that flag flies His cause is protected and served.

I am frank to tell you that I looked for this very opposition to come forth against my amendment. Somehow or other they are here encamped about the Capitol working quietly to keep this particular amendment from being adopted.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the motion I am about to make will have the effect of cutting off debate, but that is not my purpose, and if there is any Senator who desires to debate the question I will withdraw my motion. I desire to move to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. CARAWAY. Before the Senator does that——

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. CARAWAY. Before the Senator does that let me ask him a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Just a moment. The attention of the Chair was diverted. Has the Senator from Wisconsin moved to lay the amendment of the Senator from Alabama on the table?

Mr. BLAINE. I withhold the motion.

Mr. TYDINGS. I ask the Senator to withhold it until I may have an opportunity to make a few remarks.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor. Does he yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I merely wish to ask that the amendment, as presented, be read again at the desk. I had obtained one impression from it, while evidently the Senator from Alabama has another. As I understood the amendment it did not convey the same impression the Senator from Alabama has given—though possibly he is correct—that his amendment merely seeks to have the church pennant float from a different staff.

Mr. HEFLIN. At a different place, and the Secretary of the Navy is willing to have that done.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let us see if the amendment does that, as it is now framed. I ask to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the information of the Senate, the amendment will again be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, after line 8, it is proposed to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 6. That hereafter it shall be unlawful to fly any flag or pennant on the same staff or hoist above the flag of the United States of America, or colors representing the same, on any battleship, cruiser, or other vessel in the naval service of the United States. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to see that this provision is observed, and he is hereby directed to notify the commanding officers of all vessels under his jurisdiction of the provisions of this section.

Mr. CARAWAY. Right there, I wonder if the language is not somewhat doubtful—I am asking the Senator from Alabama—because it says "fly * * * on the same staff or hoist above." I do not know that I quite understand it.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator, I think, has the same idea that I had in mind first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This debate is taking place by the courtesy of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE].

Mr. HEFLIN. They have a rope that they call a hoist that may be on the same staff, and they might put some emblem on that above the American flag.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Alabama has entirely mistaken the conception of this flag about which he has been talking. I am not going to discuss that matter now; but the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] stated that he desired to make some comment upon this amendment, and I suggested before I made the motion that I would withdraw the motion if any Senator desired to debate it, as I did not want to shut off debate. I withdraw my motion, therefore, and yield the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in view of this debate I am not going to vote for this amendment; and I should much prefer to vote directly than to vote to lay the amendment on the table. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will let us vote directly upon the amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the State of Maryland as an entity has shortcomings. It is not a perfect State. Its people perhaps are not perfect; but if there ever has been a time in the last six years when they, as a whole, have been displeased with the vote on the position of either of their two representatives in the United States Senate, I am sure I can say for them to-day that they are proud of their senior Senator who sits in this body.

We believe that in this country of ours there is room for all denominations. We believe that we can live happily together without religious prejudices; and while a small group of the people in my own State may possess these prejudices, as a State Maryland is proud of her tradition that it was there for the first time in all the civilized world that men could come and worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own conscience. Of that tradition and of the senior Senator who to-day upheld it we shall always be proud.

I should like to observe that I am a member of the American Legion, and in the late unpleasantness occupied a small position where men fought with guns and not with words. At one time it became my good fortune to command a group of men 85 per cent of whom were Catholics and 25 per cent of whom were casualties in that conflict. Everyone in this body knows that, in spite of that contribution and the contribution of all Catholics in all the wars of our country, there is behind this amendment all the debate of last spring, when the subject was brought before the attention of the country by a Member of this body; and it was charged at that time that this emblem was the emblem of the Catholic Church.

It is not the emblem of the Catholic Church. It is no part of the emblem of the Catholic Church, unless the cross on which the Divine Saviour was crucified is itself an emblem of the Catholic Church.

I am not a Catholic. I have no Catholic relatives of whom I know; but I am ready, as a Protestant, to stand here and demand that that religion be not vilified, be not insulted, and that those who inherited that faith at their mother's knee shall have the same right to practice their religion in this country as has anyone else.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have only a few minutes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Very briefly.

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I wanted to ask the Senator whether he thinks the people of Maryland are in any respect different from those of every other State of the Union? It is my impression that since the debate that has occurred here to-day the people of every one of the 48 States would disapprove this amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should certainly hope so; because, in my humble judgment, if this amendment were adopted, it would practically serve notice on the entire country that religious prejudice had been the motive in this body—a reflection which the Senate of the United States can not look upon with favor.

I am glad to get the opportunity to vote on this matter, and I hope there will be a roll call. I am tired of this so-called "Christian" element that would crucify its fellow man as a tenet of its faith. There is no love in that kind of Christianity. It springs from hatred, and is as anti-Christlike as anything which can be conceived. It is the work of the ignorant brain—a brain untutored in the suffering of all the centuries through which mankind has struggled to win for itself a place of liberty in the sun. It is but a continuance of the plan to substitute man's plan for God's plan—to substitute the code of law for the Bible, the bayonet for the helping hand.

I welcome the issue. While I am not fond of casting aspersions on groups of men—I know there are some of them in my State—if ever the day should come when the men who wear the nightgown send me my orders and dictate my vote, I hope the people will take me from this body, because I should no longer care to serve, nor be fit to serve, as a Member of it. Under our Constitution every man has the right to make a fool of himself whenever he sees fit.

I hope we will settle this question to-day and now, and for all time. I hope we will put the Creator ahead of our country by defeating this amendment. If that be unpatriotic, then make the most of it.

I am glad to have this brief moment to express my position on this amendment to pay my meed of respect to my colleague [Mr. BRUCE], who is about to leave this body, and to testify that in the closing days of his service, as well as at all other times, he was true to the old traditions of which we Marylanders are so proud.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). My colleague [Mr. HOWELL] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. BRATTON (when Mr. LARRAZOLO's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LARRAZOLO] is absent from the Chamber on account of illness.

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I therefore withhold my vote. I do not know how the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] would vote, so I can not transfer the pair to him.

Mr. WHEELER (when his name was called). On this matter I have a pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]. I understand that if he were present, he would vote as I am about to vote. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN]. I have no idea how he would vote on this proposition; and, therefore, being unable to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] is absent on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 68, as follows:

YEAS—10

So Mr. HEFLIN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have read a telegram from the clerk of the Illinois House of Representatives to the President of the Senate relating to the cruiser bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The telegram was read, as follows:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., February 5, 1929.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE:

House of Representatives, State of Illinois, to-day passed resolution urging passage of Navy cruiser bill with time limit.

GEORGE C. BLAUER,
Clerk of the House.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I desire to say that I withdraw the objection I made to the proposal of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED].

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think it is fitting that I should say that there is nothing in the context of the amendment on which the Senate has just voted that has anything to do with any religious question. I am very certain that when the Navy Department considered the amendment and approved it they had no idea that there was any religious significance attached to it. The same is true of my own position when I accepted the amendment. The religious significance of the amendment has come in during the debate on the floor of the Senate, and for that I was in no way responsible.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I renew the request I made a few minutes ago.

Mr. HEFLIN. What is the request?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That I be permitted to offer an amendment in line 23, page 2, of the bill, to change the words "an international agreement," to read "a treaty." This is in line with the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think the language is full enough as it is, and I object.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Is the bill now open to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. There are several amendments on the table which have not been called up. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. ASHURST. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAINE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were privileged to vote, I would vote "nay." The Senator from Kentucky if present would vote "yea."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). Upon this vote I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. BLAINE (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is unavoidably absent. I am authorized now to state that if he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. BRATTON (when Mr. LARRAZOLO's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LARRAZOLO] is absent on account of illness. He has been unable to secure a pair. If present, he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. GLASS (when Mr. McLEAN's name was called). The senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber on account of illness. I am authorized to state that if present he would vote "yea." I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, and if I were permitted to vote I should vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (when Mr. METCALF's name was called). I was requested to announce that the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] is absent on account of illness. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WHEELER (when his name was called). On this matter I have a pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]. If he were present, he would vote "yea," and if I were permitted to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has been compelled to leave the Chamber. He is paired for the rest of the day with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. I do not know how the Senator from Mississippi would vote on this question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL. My colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] is absent on account of illness. If present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 68, nays 12, as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 4

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
NINTH STATE LEGISLATURE, REGULAR SESSION.

Magnificent in public life, in all that makes for true magnificence, a loyal member of his party, but endowed with that honorable and upright character which allowed for hosts of political friends and many political enemies, keenly alert at all times to the welfare of mankind; a potential candidate on several occasions for the greatest honor within the gift of his party; still facing certain defeat by his open and magnificent fight against a hooded and cowled secret society; with abiding faith in the future greatness of the country he loved and served, was Oscar W. Underwood, Democratic leader and three times candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination.

He died at his estate in Woodlawn, overlooking the shrine of George Washington at Mount Vernon, on Friday, January 25, 1929, after 30 years' service in the interest of his country.

Sincerely mourning and realizing the great loss our country has suffered by the death of this leading citizen: It is hereby

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Ninth State Legislature of the State of Arizona in regular session assembled (the State Senate concurring), That as a fitting tribute to a great American statesman, the legislature adjourn this day one hour before the regular time of adjournment; be it further

Resolved, That these resolutions expressing our sorrow at the passing of the Hon. Oscar W. Underwood be incorporated in the journals of the day, thus inscribing for all time the action of the Ninth State Legislature of the State of Arizona; be it also further

Resolved, That suitably engrossed copies of these resolutions be transmitted to the Speaker of the National House of Representatives at Washington, the President of the United States Senate, and to the bereaved widow of the departed statesman.

The act has been approved by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, it meets the approval of the War Department, and I earnestly recommend that the requisite approval be given by the Congress as speedily as practicable.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the statue of Jefferson Davis, presented by the State of Mississippi, to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered the State for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent citizens, illustrious for his valor as a soldier and his distinguished services as a statesman.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the Governor of Mississippi.

STATUE OF JAMES Z. GEORGE

Mr. STEPHENS submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 37), which was referred to the Committee on the Library:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the statue of James Z. George, presented by the State of Mississippi, to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered the State for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent citizens, illustrious for his valor as a soldier, his ability as a jurist, and his distinguished services as a statesman.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the Governor of Mississippi.

PROPOSED SALE OF VESSELS OF THE UNITED STATES AND AMERICAN MERCHANT LINES

Mr. McKELLAR submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 319), which was ordered to lie on the table:

Whereas the United States Shipping Board has offered for sale to American citizens the steamships Leviathan, George Washington, America, Republic, President Harding, and President Roosevelt, now being operated as the United States Lines, and the steamships American Farmer, American Banker, American Shipper, American Merchant, and American Trader, now being operated as the American Merchant Line; and

Whereas the United States Shipping Board has, pursuant to its invitation, received several bids for said steamships and said services, and it is reported that the board is about to accept one of said bids and sell said steamships; and

Whereas the said services are now being maintained with said ships by the shipping board between the Port of New York and ports of England, France, and Germany, and constitute the only American-flag passenger and mail and combination passenger, cargo, and mail services between the United States and the other three principal political and commercial nations of the world; and

Whereas the said services of the United States Lines and American Merchant Line, because of the countries to which they operate, the number and character of American citizens who travel to and from Europe and the United States for business, educational, pleasure, and other purposes, are rightly to be regarded as the premier and most essential of all American foreign-trade services; and

Whereas the maintenance of said services is, and the steamships now being operated and required to be operated in said services are of a type and class most essential for national defense; and

Whereas for the reasons hereinbefore set forth it is of the highest public interest that said services and all or any of said steamships should be sold by the United States to American citizens only upon such terms and conditions as shall give assurance that said services can, under present authorizations of mail pay and under any reasonable forecast of business be successfully maintained and developed and that the obligations required to be imposed upon the purchaser by the Shipping Board, under and pursuant to the conditions of its invitation for bids, can be carried out successfully by the party or parties to whom said ships and services are proposed by the board to be sold; and

Whereas one of said bids now before the Shipping Board provides for the construction of two giant steamships to cost approximately $28,000,000 each and another of said bids provides for the reconditioning of the steamships Mount Vernon and Monticello along the lines authorized by Congress under the act approved May 16, 1928, 75 per cent of the cost of which construction or reconditioning is to be advanced by the United States; and

Whereas any sale by the United States of said steamships and said services, and especially any sale embodying obligations to build new and costly ships, to the costs whereof the United States is to loan 75 per cent to be secured by first mortgages on such ships, leaving the private capital invested therein to be secured at best by subordinate mortgages, carries with it the implication (and almost the national guaranty) that such sale to private interests and the investment of such capital by its citizens is financially sound and the business enterprise resulting therefrom can be successful and the obligations undertaken can be met and performed; and

Whereas any financial disaster which might overtake an enterprise in the purchase and construction of the ships and the maintenance and operation of the services hereinbefore mentioned might not only involve American citizens in financial loss and entangle the United States with its citizens in the matter of marshaling the securities issued to the public by the owning or operating company or companies, but would seriously jeopardize the future operation of these premier services and might well adversely affect national defense and the future of the American merchant marine by discrediting maritime securities with the American people, as well as in other direct and indirect ways; and

Whereas it is most essential to the public interest that the aforesaid steamships and services be sold only after the most careful and searching inquiry into the character and the experience in similar business enterprises and the financial responsibility of the bidders, the merits and business soundness of the proposals embodied in the respective bids, and of the undertaking required thereunder to be imposed upon and performed by the bidders, and the obligations and burdens to be imposed upon the United States morally, financially, and otherwise by and through the acceptance of any of said bids, to the end that the bid, if any, which shall be accepted shall be such as to give reasonable assurance of the continued successful maintenance and upbuilding of these principal American-trade and national-defense services; and

Whereas the ascertainment of the facts hereinbefore outlined can only be obtained and desirable wide public information in regard thereto can only be had through an investigation and public hearings by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be authorized and directed to investigate fully into each and all bids, and into all the phases and particulars thereof, now pending before the United States Shipping Board for the purchase and operation of the United States Lines and the steamships Leviathan, George Washington, America, Republic, President Harding, and President Roosevelt, and the American Merchant Line and the steamships American Farmer, American Banker, American Shipper, American Merchant, and American Trader, and/or for the construction and/or reconditioning of new ships or existing ships, and into forecasts of the commercial results reasonably to be expected from the operation of such ships.

That full authority is hereby vested in said committee to hold all hearings, whenever and wherever deemed necessary for said purposes, to require the production of records, documents, and other writings, to swear witnesses, and to take such other steps as may be found by said committee to be proper.

That pending further action by the Senate the United States Shipping Board is hereby requested to withhold making any sale of said steamships or said services, or to enter into contracts for the construction of new ships, or reconditioning of existing ships, for the use in such services.

UNEMPLOYMENT: CAUSES AND REMEDIES

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a very instructive article from the Catholic World for February, 1929, upon "Unemployment: Causes and Remedies," including a discussion of the unemployment bills now pending in the Senate, by John A. Ryan, D. D., a well-known and able writer upon social, labor, and economic problems.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNEMPLOYMENT: CAUSES AND REMEDIES

By John A. Ryan, D. D.

Despite the assurances of present and future prosperity which we received during the recent political campaign, the problem of unemployment remains actual and urgent. This statement rests upon two facts: First, the considerable number of workers unemployed at the present time; second, the necessity of seeking means to prevent some, at least, of the hardships to be expected from the next industrial depression.

The United States Bureau of Labor statistics informs us that last October the index number of employment in our manufacturing industries was 88.1 per cent and on the railroads 89.1 per cent. In other words, the number of employees in manufacturing industries was 12 per cent less than in 1923 and on the railroads 11 per cent less. If these ratios are true of all our industries, and of our 31,000,000 wage earners, employment has declined in five years by about three and one-half million persons. Whether so many persons are actually out of work to-day no one can confidently say, but we might not be far wrong if we placed the number at 3,000,000. Therefore, the present situation is of itself sufficiently acute to demand the serious consideration of all who believe that the welfare of millions of human beings is more important than complacent contemplation of alleged national "prosperity."

THE PARTICULAR CAUSES

What are the causes of unemployment? They may be conveniently enumerated as particular and chronic. The particular causes may be subdivided into seasonal, local, and technical. The seasonal causes are those which inhere in the so-called "seasonal" industries. Examples of these are the building trades and the garment trades. In the former a large proportion of the workers are unemployed in cold weather; in the latter the majority are out of work for several weeks twice a year. Local causes are those which arise out of the cessation or the reduction of industrial activities in particular places, and the transfer of these activities to other places. The shoe and textile industries in New England are apt illustrations. Technical causes are those which accompany improvements in machinery and in methods of production generally, bringing about reductions in the number of workers that are able to turn out the same or a greater quantity of goods. This process of substituting machines for men is continuous over great areas of industry. In the last five years about one and one-quarter million jobs have disappeared in our factories alone.

Let us bear in mind that all three of these particular causes are active and persistent even in times of greatest prosperity. Of course, their evil effects vastly increase in periods of general depression.

REMEDIES

The primary means of dealing with the unemployment produced by particular causes is a comprehensive system of employment exchanges, or employment offices. Such a system must comprise National and State, as well as municipal agencies. And they should operate in close coordination and cooperation. Only through such a system can complete information be gathered concerning the men who are looking for jobs and the jobs that are available for men. Not the least important task of an adequate employment service would be to obtain complete and detailed information concerning the total amount of unemployment and to keep that information up to date. At present the only national agency which attempts any part of this task is the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, but it investigates only a small part of the field, and even there it shows only the changes in the amount of unemployment, not the total number of unemployed. A national employment service was established during the war and did a vast amount of good. Referring to it the Catholic Bishops' Program of Social Reconstruction declared: "It is the obvious duty of Congress to continue and strengthen this important institution." Unfortunately, Congress did not see fit to adopt this recommendation. The United States Employment Service was allowed to die of inanition. Congress ought to enact the measure now pending for its revival.

Insurance against unemployment is another of the long-accepted and standard remedies. It may be either private or public. The former is provided jointly by the employers and the employees in a given plant or industry, or by either group acting alone. Several of the more stable and prosperous trade-unions maintain out-of-work benefits for their members. A few concerns, such as the Dennison Co., of Framingham, Mass., have created out of surplus earnings a fund from which the employees receive a certain per cent of their regular wages when the firm is unable to continue them at work. Examples of unemployment insurance financed and operated jointly by employer and employee are seen in the garment trades.

Other things being equal, unemployment insurance conducted by employers or employees, or by both, is preferable to that maintained by the public authority. It is better that men should do things for themselves than to have things done for them by others, even by the state. In the greater part of the field, however, "other things" are not equal. The great majority of employers and employees are unable or unwilling to provide adequate funds. Hence the public authority ought to be called upon to do in America what it has done in many of the countries of Europe. However, none of the European schemes seems to be as desirable as the one which was drawn up in Wisconsin and which passed one house of the legislature of that State. This measure provided, in brief, that any person who had been employed for six months or more by an employer who was no longer able to furnish him with work would be entitled to daily stipend for not to exceed 13 weeks in any one year, in case he could find no employment elsewhere.

This proposal has two conspicuous merits. First, it places the burden of unemployment where it belongs, namely, upon industry. To the extent that industry does not pay the worker a sufficient wage to enable him to protect himself against all the hazards and contingencies of life, it ought to fulfill that duty through some form of insurance.

This is the principle which underlies and justifies our workmen's compensation law. As the employee has a moral claim against industry—that is, his employer—for compensation in case of occupational accident or disease, he has likewise a valid claim for daily compensation when industry fails to provide him with employment. An industrial system which requires men to spend their entire lives in its service should provide them with the means of suppliyng all the wants of life.

The second merit of the Wisconsin plan is the salutary restraint that it would put upon the inclination of employees to expand their activities unnecessarily. The business man who contemplated increasing his plant during a temporary "boom" would think a second time before putting the project into execution. He would reflect that an increased number of employees would require a larger outlay for unemployment benefits when business operations again became slack. The same consideration would occur to the banker to whom the business man might apply for credit to finance the project of expansion.

The third of the standard remedies is increased expenditures for public works during periods of industrial depression. Judging by the acclaim with which this proposal was received when it was put before the recent meeting of State governors on behalf of President-elect Hoover, our American newspapers and many prominent individuals seem to be under the impression that it is a brand-new scheme excogitated by the "great engineer." As a matter of fact, it has been approved and advocated by all authorities on unemployment for upward of half a century. Its value and efficacy depend upon its comprehensiveness, its magnitude, and the extent to which it is ready for operation at the very beginning of a recession in private employment. The Jones bill, now before Congress, is far from adequate. It provides for an appropriation of $150,000,000 for expenditure upon certain public works after a decline of 20 per cent in building contracts has occurred during three consecutive months. Here are three glaring defects: The amount of money provided is insufficient for any but temporary and partial depressions; it does not become operative at the outset of the depression and, therefore, lacks an important element of prevention, and it relies upon only one index of declining business, namely, building contracts, whereas several others are available.

The program set before his fellow State executives by Governor Brewster is much better than that contained in the Jones bill. It contemplates the continuous control and planning of an expenditure of $3,000,000,000 over a period of several years. It would involve a lessening of expenditures for public works during a period of prosperity as well as an increase during a period of depression, and it would require the joint and coordinate action of the National, State, county, and municipal authorities. Such a plan is not easy nor simple to operate, yet nothing less would be of much value in dealing with any considerable amount of unemployment. On the other hand, it should not be beyond the ingenuity of our legislators and public executives if they are willing to attack the problem seriously and whole-heartedly.

A CHRONIC CAUSE

The particular causes of unemployment have long been active in every country that has emerged from a purely agricultural economy. What I would call "a chronic cause" is peculiar to recent times and is particularly active in the United States. It is general overproduction or underconsumption. The vast majority, if not all, of our industries are capable of producing more goods than can be sold at profitable prices. Or, to describe the problem in terms of the consumer, those who would like to buy more goods have not the money; those who have the money to buy more lack the desire. As a consequence the capacity for overproduction has become chronic and unemployment or imminent danger of unemployment has likewise become chronic.

During the last two years of the Great War some four and one-half million able-bodied Americans were withdrawn from productive industry; nevertheless, our country sent to Europe at least $12,000,000,000 worth of goods in excess of our regular exports. At the same time there was sufficient produced and retained at home to enable the masses of our people to live in greater comfort than had been possible for them at any previous period of American history. Upon good authority it has been estimated that the power resources of our country are equivalent to the labor of 30 human slaves for every man, woman, and child. In the palmiest days of Athens the free citizens of that city commanded on an average the labor of only three slaves.

The general condition is strikingly described in a recent article by Ethelbert Steuart, United States Commissioner of Labor Statistics:

"We are living in an age of surplus. We have a surplus of food from the farms, a surplus of products from the factories, and a surplus of man power for both the manufacturing and agricultural industries. Yet we proceed as if we were still living in an age of want—as if the demand everywhere still exceeded the supply. On every hand the condition of surplus continues to be met by feverish effort for more production with less man power. * * *

"We're up against a new system. The machine has put production ahead of population. What are we going to do with what we produce? The man who made two blades of grass grow where one grew before was a public benefactor then. But to-day we have all the hay we need and more. The fellow who makes two stalks of wheat grow where one grew before isn't a public benefactor unless he creates new wants for his product and new ways of supplying them. * * *

"The increases in output per man power from 1914 to 1925 include: Iron and steel, 59 per cent; boots and shoes, 6 per cent; leather tanning, 26 per cent; slaughtering and meat packing, 27 per cent; petroleum refining, 83 per cent; paper and pulp manufacturing, 34 per cent; cement manufacturing, 61 per cent; automobiles, 172 per cent; rubber tires, 211 per cent; flour milling, 36 per cent; sugar refining, 28 per cent."

These figures cover the period from 1914 to 1925. More recent years show an even more striking evidence of the same trend. Between the year 1922 and the month of April, 1928, the average output, per man, in all manufacturing industries, increased 33 per cent. In 1925 the farmers fed 39,000,000 persons more than the same number of farmers fed in 1900.

Our vastly increased production and our chronic overproduction are clearly reflected in the amount of money expended in the effort to sell goods. If consumption were keeping pace with production, at least three-fourths of the advertising costs and other selling costs would be unnecessary. In the Atlantic Monthly, September, 1928, a manufacturer states the situation in the following terms: "In our business we have come to the appalling situation wherein it costs nearly twice as much to pay for the man power involved in selling the goods as it does to pay for producing them. If every one of our factory employees would work for nothing, so that our pay roll for productive labor would be absolutely zero, the saving would not be enough to get us into the dividend-paying class. Why? Just because it costs too much to sell goods. Salesmen's salaries, commissions, and expenses are not all of the costs of selling. There are brokers' commissions, advertising costs, demonstrations, free deals, discounts, special discounts, circulars, and what not, till it fairly makes one sick."

Even religion has been enlisted in the great business of selling goods. This development is effectively described in an article entitled "Religion in Business" in the September (1927) issue of Harper's Magazine. The writer assumes that the national association of aluminum ash tray manufacturers plans thus for its next convention: "We must do something to convince the public that it should buy our aluminum ash trays instead of brass, china, or silver ash trays. We'll engage some nationally known speaker who is connected with one of the big uplift organizations to make an address. We'll feature also a couple of popular preachers. These things will make a good impression when our convention proceedings are reported in the newspapers. Church people everywhere will get the idea that the aluminum ash-tray industry stands for morality, and they'll buy aluminum trays instead of brass, china, or silver trays. Of course, we'll have to have a little amusement for the delegates besides, something like a cabaret show or a beauty contest."

So far as America is concerned, the problem of providing all the inhabitants with the means of decent living is no longer a problem of production. It is the problem of increasing the consuming power of the masses so that more of the goods that are produced, or that could be produced, will be sold. Obviously the solution of this problem would benefit industry as well as the masses of the workers. The effect upon industry of increasing consuming power may be visualized if we imagine what would follow a notable reduction in present consumption. Suppose all skilled laborers should diminish their purchases by one-third. They could do so and still exist. Imagine the financial injury which this saving would inflict upon all industry and business. Exactly the reverse effect would be produced if the great bulk of the laboring classes were enabled somehow to increase their purchases by one-third.

Imagine the condition of American industry without the recent invention of installment buying. It has been estimated that at least $6,000,000,000 worth of goods were bought on this plan in the year 1926. Had these goods not been bought our industries would have produced that much less and would have been idle during a corresponding length of time. That would have meant an industrial depression.

So obvious is it that our productive capacity exceeds our capacity to get goods consumed, so obvious is it that industry can not keep going without a wide and great diffusion of purchasing power, that employers are now preaching the doctrine of high wages. They realize the need for a large consuming power in the hands of the working classes. "On this point the American Federation of Labor has always been right," says Foster and Catchings, "but various associations of employers have sometimes been wrong."

The outstanding examples of great unemployment caused by excessive capacity for production are provided by the textile and soft-coal industries. These are so notorious and of such long standing that not even the most simple-minded believer in the "economic harmonies" nor the most devoted believer in Republican "prosperity" can explain them away. Nevertheless, they are merely the most conspicuous instances of a condition that constantly threatens most of our great industries. In varying degrees this condition of overproduction and unemployment is actually present in several other industries besides textile manufacturing and soft-coal mining. A recent article in the New Republic states: "The iron hand of depression weighs heavily on the hard-coal communities. For the first time in a long and varied history collieries have been shut down for longer than a year at a stretch * * *. With the reduction of the demand for anthracite, according to reports, the industry must deflate itself to the minimum working force by the installation of the newest mining equipment * * *. But the incoming changes promise to be permanent and the miner's wait for a job will become longer and longer."

When we speak of general overproduction, we have in mind, of course, the effective demand, not the sum total of human wants. In the latter sense general overproduction is probably impossible, for it is unlikely that human beings will not develop desires for all the goods that they can produce. The trouble is that a large proportion of the desire for goods is not supported by money to buy the goods. Overproduction, then, is asserted relatively to the desire to consume combined with the power to consume. Of course, I am well aware that the majority of economists still repeat the formula of their predecessors that there can be no such thing as general overproduction, even in the sense just defined. They maintain that a supply of goods is always a demand for other goods. We have not time to examine fully this theory. Let it suffice to point out that in our industrial society goods are not directly exchanged for other goods; they are exchanged for money; and it is quite conceivable that the masses of the population who would like to consume all the surplus goods of all the industries are without sufficient money to buy them.

In the second place, a large proportion of the capitalists and business men who control the surplus and excess products, actual or potential, desire only one kind of goods. They do not wish to exchange their surplus for more food, clothing, shelter, or other goods of consumption. They already have all that they can consume of these products. What they would like to have is more production goods, more machinery, and other forms of capital. Of course, they could get them because capital goods are also produced in excessive abundance. Their only reason for not taking more capital goods is the fact that they can not find a market for the additional products which these new capital instruments would turn out. The automobile manufacturer who has already supplied all his wants for consumption goods will not exchange his surplus automobiles for materials to increase his production of automobiles. What is true of him is true of thousands of other capitalists in other industries.

REMEDIES

One obvious remedy for this chronic unemployment has already been described under the head of increased expenditures for public works. However, this would be palliative rather than curative; partial rather than fundamental; general rather than specific; temporary rather than permanent. In order to be fundamental and specific the remedies must deal with the fundamental and specific causes, namely, overproduction and underconsumption. There are only two such remedial measures, and they are closely interrelated.

Since we are producing too much, it would seem that we might with advantage spend less time upon these material things and more on the improvement of our minds, on acquiring culture. Within certain limits, this assumption is thoroughly sound. We produce more luxuries and even more comforts than are good for us, and we waste a great deal in the course of production, distribution, and consumption. Nevertheless, we do not produce too much clothing, too much building material, too many hospitals, or too much education. The problem is to get these goods into the hands of the right persons. Hence, the fundamental need is a better distribution of purchasing power. Those persons who have the money to consume the surplus products have not the desire to do so; those who have the desire have not the purchasing power. The former class saves too much of its income and converts too much into capital. One billion dollars or more of American money is invested annually in foreign countries. If, instead of being exported, this fund were distributed among the 10,000,000 poorest paid of our wage earners, it would provide an average increase of $100 each in their annual incomes.

Overproduction can be greatly reduced and consumption greatly increased through a general policy of high wages. If the matter could be arranged scientifically and humanely those sections of the laboring class that are now underpaid would be made the chief beneficiaries of this policy. A universal minimum wage law would be the most effective contribution to the solution of the problem of overproduction and underconsumption. Since the decision of the Supreme Court in the District of Columbia Minimum Wage Case, this remedy is not among the practical possibilities. Every other method which is legitimate should be utilized for the purpose of increasing wages, especially the wages of those who are now receiving less than the equivalent of a decent livelihood.

The other fundamental remedy is the 5-day week. If this were general it would at the same time diminish production and increase wages. It has already been obtained by some sections of the laboring population. We all realize that this project is highly complex. There is the question of a right use of the leisure time that will result, and there is the fact that those powerful labor groups which obtain the 5-day week first are probably those who need it least. Nevertheless, the difficulties must be faced and a beginning must be made somewhere. The possession of increased leisure will compel men to examine how best it may be used. The general extension of the 5-day week can come only after it has been established in a few industries by a few of the more powerful labor organizations. Such has been the history of the 8-hour day, and, indeed, of every important improvement made in the condition of labor.

To the objection that a higher scale of wages and a 5-day week with no reduction in weekly wages, would so increase the cost of production that demand for goods would decline, causing a decrease rather than an increase in employment, there are two replies. First, the prices of goods would not increase as much as the wages of labor, since wages are only a part of the cost of production. A part of the increased cost of goods would be borne by consumers who are not wage earners. In the second place, our industries are admittedly capable of providing more of the necessaries and comforts of life than are now obtained by the majority of the laboring class. The only problem before us, then, is that of somehow making the right kind of distribution. If it can not be made through the price system and the wage system, some other method should and must be found. The absurd contradiction between the enforced idleness of machines and workers that could provide plenty for all the people if they were kept going, and millions of human beings who would have sufficient if the idle machines and men were to get busy in providing for their wants—is a grave reproach to our industrial system and our economic civilization. It constitutes the sharpest challenge that has ever been hurled at industrial statesmanship.

TRANSFER OF LAND IN OREGON

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4036) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer the control of certain land in Oregon to the Secretary of the Interior, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer to the control of the Secretary of the Interior, for the use and benefit of certain Indians now using and occupying the land as a fishing-camp site, two irregular-shaped parcels of land containing in the aggregate approximately 7.4 acres, located in lot 1 of section 17 and in lots 1 and 2 of section 20, township 2 north, range 15 east, Willamette meridian, Oregon, originally acquired by the United States as a right of way for a projected boat railway in connection with the improvements of The Dalles-Celilo section of the Columbia River: Provided, That a strip 40 feet wide be reserved from such transfer for a roadway connection between the lock keeper's grounds at Celilo and the Columbia River Highway.

Mr. FRAZIER. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

PORT WASHINGTON NARROWS BRIDGE

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, there is on the table a bill to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Port Washington Narrows. I ask that the bill may be laid before the Senate, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 16035) to extend the time for completing the construction of the bridge across Port Washington Narrows, within the city of Bremerton, State of Washington, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for completing the construction of the bridge across Port Washington Narrows, within the city of Bremerton, State of Washington, authorized by the act of Congress, entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to W. E. Buell, of Seattle, Wash., to construct a bridge across Port Washington Narrows, within the city of Bremerton, in the State of Washington," approved June 14, 1926, be, and the same is hereby, extended three years from June 14, 1929.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the similar Senate bill will be indefinitely postponed.

VALIDATION OF CERTAIN PUBLIC-LAND ENTRIES

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5110) entitled "An act validating certain applications for and entries of public lands, and for other purposes," which was on page 4, after line 3, to insert:

SEC. 7. That no qualified homestead entryman who, prior to November 1, 1928, made bona fide entry upon lands of the United States in Moffat, Rio Blanco, and Routt Counties, Colo., under the provisions of the homestead laws of the United States, and who established residence in good faith upon the lands entered by him, shall be subject to contest for failure to maintain residence or make improvements upon his land subsequent to the incursion of swarms of crickets or grasshoppers upon said land, or in the vicinity; but such entryman shall, within 90 days after issuance of notice by the Secretary of the Interior that the emergency occasioned by such insect invasion has terminated, file in the office of the register of the local land office an affidavit that he has reestablished his residence on the land, with the intention of maintaining the same for a period sufficient to enable him to make final proof: Provided, That any entry heretofore canceled within said counties may, subject to intervening adverse rights, be reinstated on a proper showing by the entryman that a leave of absence under this act would have been warranted: Provided further, That no such entryman shall be entitled to have counted as a part of the required period of residence any period of time during which he was not actually upon said land prior to the date of the notice aforesaid.

Mr. NYE. This amendment has the approval of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, and I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS UNDER WAR MINERALS ACT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1347) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1919, as amended, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That any claimant who has heretofore filed with the Secretary of the Interior within the time and manner provided by existing law a claim under said acts generally known as the war minerals acts (40 Stat. 1272, and its amendments) may within one year from the date of the passage and approval hereof petition the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to review the final decision of the Secretary of the Interior upon any question of law which has arisen or which may hereafter arise in the adjustment, liquidation, and payment of his claim under said acts, but the decision of the Secretary of the Interior on all questions of fact shall be conclusive and not subject to review by any court.

SEC. 2. In any proceeding brought under the provisions of section 1 of this act the Secretary of the Interior shall be designated as the defendant or respondent, and upon the filing of the petition the cause shall follow the usual procedure, subject to such rules or orders as the court may make with respect thereto.

SEC. 3. Jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, as a district court of the United States, to hear and determine all such suits and enter all orders, judgments, and decrees therein, subject to the usual right of appeal by either party to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, whose final judgment may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States by petition for certiorari or by appeal as provided by law and the rules of the court.

Mr. ODDIE. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

Mr. BRATTON. I think some explanation should be made of it, as apparently it is an entirely new bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] will let the amendment go over until to-morrow.

Mr. BRATTON and Mr. HEFLIN. Let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. ODDIE. Very well.

BIRTHPLACE OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, the House passed yesterday and sent to the Senate a bill for the improvement of the birthplace of Abraham Lincoln. There is a similar bill on the Senate calendar which has the unanimous indorsement of the committee. I ask that the House bill be laid before the Senate, considered and passed, and that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed. It is an authorization bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the House bill has already been substituted on the calendar for the Senate bill and the Senate bill has already been indefinitely postponed by order of the President pro tempore, recently.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Kentucky wants to pass the bill which has been placed on the calendar?

Mr. SACKETT. I do.

Mr. HEFLIN. I hope it will be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I do not object to the particular bill in question; but I do object to any bill being considered at this time. I think, after we have all been here as we have to-day, this character of business should not be transacted at this time of day. Most of us thought there would not be anything done after the cruiser bill was disposed of. There are bills on the calendar to which I object most seriously. If this sort of procedure is to be carried on, of course it is possible during the last days of the session for some one to ask unanimous consent to have a bill passed as a matter of courtesy; and any bill might be passed whether some Senator wants to object to it or not. I do not think the Senate should legislate at this late hour after the understanding practically that there would not be anything done except to dispose of the cruiser bill.

If this bill should be passed to-night, then to-morrow, if I did not happen to be present and some Senator should want to put through a judgeship bill to which I do most earnestly object or to put through a post office bill to which I most earnestly object, unanimous consent might be given and the bill rushed through in my absence. I do not think this is a good custom. I want to protest against it individually, and for that reason I must object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, the Senator should remember there was but one Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. BLEASE. And there is only one judgeship asked for in the State of South Carolina.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina listen to me for a moment?

Mr. BLEASE. I have taken my position and I hope I am clearly understood. I object to this manner of legislation.

Mr. SACKETT. There are now between 400 and 500 automobiles visiting this national shrine daily, and the health officer of the State of Kentucky has told me that the place is in such an insanitary condition that he ought to close it to the general public. It seemed to me that it was the wrong thing for the country to permit one of its great national shrines to get into that condition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think there is much force in the statement just made by the Senator from South Carolina. We have been proceeding here diligently and toward the end of every session we frequently proceed to legislate without due deliberation. I do wish, however, under the circumstances, that he would find it consistent to withdraw his objection to the bill.

Mr. BLEASE. If I should do so, then somebody might let a bill to which I object go through when it is called up.

Mr. SACKETT. This is a rather peculiar case, if the Senator please.

Mr. BLEASE. Oh, well, I will withdraw the objection with the understanding, positive and distinct, that if any of the judgeship bills to which I am objecting so earnestly shall be called up, I hope some Senator will be gentleman enough to object if I am not here.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 15657) to provide for the improvement and preservation of the land and buildings of the Abraham Lincoln National Park or Reservation was read first by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of protecting from disintegration and of improving, beautifying, and preserving the Abraham Lincoln National Park or Reservation established under the act entitled "An act to accept a deed or gift or conveyance from the Lincoln Farm Association, a corporation, to the United States of America, of land near the town of Hodgenville, county of Larue, State of Kentucky, embracing the homestead of Abraham Lincoln and the log cabin in which he was born, together with the memorial hall inclosing the same; and further to accept an assignment or transfer of an endowment fund of $50,000 in relation thereto," approved July 17, 1916 (U. S. C., title 16, secs. 211–214), the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to provide for (1) the improvement of such existing roadways, walks, and buildings in such park or reservation; and (2) the planting of such trees, plants, and shrubbery; the construction of such additional roadways, walks, and buildings, and of such fences, parking spaces, drainage structures, culverts, and bridges; and the making of such other improvements as in his judgment may be necessary for the preservation, beautification, and protection from disintegration of such park or reservation, including the log cabin in which Abraham Lincoln was born and the memorial hall inclosing the same, and which may serve to render such park or reservation convenient for the appropriate use and enjoyment by the public.

SEC. 2. There is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the provisions of section 1 of this act; and authorization is also hereby given for such appropriations as may, in the future, be deemed necessary for the proper protection, preservation, care, maintenance, and operation of the said national park or reservation, including the salaries and compensation of a superintendent and other needed employees.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the similar Senate bill is indefinitely postponed.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED LAND AT MANCHESTER, N. H.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4739) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell certain Government-owned land at Manchester, N. H., which was, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "New Hampshire Fire Insurance Co." and insert "highest bidder, after public advertisement."

Mr. KEYES. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator explain the amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think the objections to this course of procedure are so good that at least we ought to have an explanation of what the amendment is.

Mr. KEYES. This is a bill authorizing the Treasury Department to sell a small bit of land in the State of New Hampshire on the site of the Federal post-office building. The Senate passed the bill, but it provided for the sale to a designated private party at a sum not less than so much, namely, for $20,000, for a very small bit of land. The House has amended the bill simply to provide that the Treasury Department shall dispose of the land to the highest bidder after advertising. That is all there is to it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to the Senator's motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

SANDUSKY BAY BRIDGE, OHIO

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to take from the table a bill messaged from the House to-day relating to the construction of a bridge near Sandusky, Ohio.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 16208) authorizing the Cedar Point Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the southeast arm of Sandusky Bay at or near Sandusky, Ohio, was read twice by its title.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I should like to have unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, can we not have a calendar day when we can go into all these matters and not have them taken up in this indiscriminate way?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is the intention to take a recess, if the Senate will agree to do so, and to-morrow we shall ask for an adjournment so that the following day there will be two hours for the consideration of bills on the calendar. The program was for the Caraway bill to be made the unfinished business and that it should then be temporarily laid aside and the Army appropriation bill called up and proceeded with to-morrow.

There being no objection the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURTON, the bill (S. 5219) granting consent of Congress to the Cedar Point Bridge Co., a corporation organized under the laws of Ohio, of Sandusky, Erie County, Ohio, to construct a bridge across Sandusky Bay, in the city of Sandusky, Erie County, Ohio, was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I should like to have unanimous consent at this time to call up a bridge bill, a House bill just passed.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. O Mr. President, there are about 40 bridge bills on the calendar which we would like to have passed. Can we not call them up and pass them collectively?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I must demand the regular order. Those bridge bills can be taken up in the morning hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded.

PROBLEMS AND ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF BUREAU OF RECLAMATION

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have in my hand a brief address delivered recently by Dr. Elwood Mead, Commissioner of Reclamation, a very clear and very informative statement with reference to the problems and accomplishments of the Bureau of Reclamation. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH OF DR. ELWOOD MEAD, COMMISSIONER OF RECLAMATION, ON THE PROBLEMS AND ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE BUREAU OF RECLAMATION, DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BROADCAST BY STATION WJSV AT WASHINGTON, D. C., AT 8 P. M. FEBRUARY 5

The Reclamation Bureau was created to build irrigation works and make homes on the unpeopled deserts of the arid region. In urging this policy President Roosevelt said that the reclamation and settlement of these lands would enrich every portion of the country; that home making was but another name for nation building.

The operation of the act has amply sustained the President's forecast. More than 600,000 people live on the Federal reclamation projects that dot the thousand-mile zone of scanty and uncertain rainfall that once separated the humid East from the cities and farms of the Pacific coast. On these projects are 685 schools and 683 churches. The crops grown in 1928 were worth $135,000,000, which amount is almost sufficient to pay off in a single year the entire indebtedness of the projects to the Government, amounting to $166,000,000. The cheap local food products which these projects supply have helped to open mining districts and keep mines in operation. The policy has strengthened the range stock industry by providing winter feed for stock, which without this would have starved. It has cheapened freight rates by giving an immense amount of local business to transcontinental roads.

One or two illustrations will show this. In one Federal irrigation district where 25 years ago the only livestock was jack rabbits and coyotes a single town paid the Burlington Railroad last year $800,000 in freight charges. More freight was carried over the Union Pacific to and from two Government projects on Snake River in Idaho than came from the entire State before these projects were built.

THE WHOLE COUNTRY BENEFITS

These reclaimed areas are supplying this country with numerous valuable products which can not be grown elsewhere, and they supply our markets with fresh vegetables at seasons of the year when climate suspends production in other sections. Dates can only be grown in the arid irrigated Southwest. Sugar beets, rice, and long-staple cotton, grown on these projects, lessen the amount of money we have to send abroad. Federal irrigated areas furnish an immense and stable market for the products of eastern factories. Automobiles, farm machinery, clothing, and other articles manufactured in the East fill the warehouses of western towns. Providing these things gives employment to thousands of workers and creates larger local demands for the products of eastern farms. Because so many of the products of western reclamation do not compete with those of humid sections and the support given to eastern industries these projects have not injured eastern agriculture. On the contrary, they have helped it.

DEVELOPMENT BY PRIVATE ENTERPRISE AIDED AND EXTENDED

Federal reclamation has supplemented and aided private irrigation enterprises. It has done this because its reserve of resources and continued operation enable it to undertake works too large and too costly for private capital. Works to control and use large rivers are being built mainly by the Federal Government and will be increasingly built by this agency in the future. In nearly every large river valley of the arid region the reclamation policy has acted as a life-saver for communities begun by private enterprise. The settlers in Salt River Valley, Ariz., living under a half a dozen privately built canals, found themselves unable to obtain means to complete their works or build the reservoir needed to regulate the river's discharge. By taking over and rebuilding these works and building the Roosevelt Reservoir it made of this valley one of the richest agricultural districts in the West and one of Arizona's greatest economic assets. In a valley where no agricultural crop can be grown without irrigation the crops taken from its irrigated fields in 1928 were worth $26,100,000.

Similar aid in extending and safeguarding private development, by building great storage works and larger and more substantial canals, has exerted its beneficent influence on the irrigated communities of the Rio Grande, Yakima, Snake, Missouri, and North Platte Rivers. No other investment of the Government has brought greater social or economic returns, and because of the local need for this development none other has been of greater national advantage.

ALL MONEY SPENT COMES FROM THE ARID REGION

There is a widespread belief that the money spent on reclamation comes from taxes and that the farmers of the humid section pay these taxes. Nothing of the kind occurs. The original act provided that development would be limited to the money made available from the sales of public lands and from the income obtained from the sale of these works to water users, when built. This income from the payment of construction costs was to be a revolving fund and be available for building other works. The water users' construction payments are now the chief source of money for building new works. The revolving fund is revolving. Last year settlers' payments amounted to more than $5,000,000. The payments from a single project reached the huge total of $1,765,000. In addition to the income from land sales and water users' payments, some revenue comes from oil and other mineral leases, and the revenues from power plants. In all, about $11,500,000 was appropriated for construction in 1929.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL ASPECTS OF IRRIGATION

Conquering the desert requires more than canals and reservoirs. Before satisfactory results from irrigation can be secured, soil baked for centuries must be subdued. The surface has to be leveled so that water will flow over it easily. Thousands of farm houses and other farm buildings have to be built; equipment and livestock have to be provided. The amount of money required for these things is far greater than has been realized, and the obstacles which confront settlers are so serious that organization and direction are needed in overcoming them.

The importance of planning settlement and farm development has only begun to be realized. The greatest progress in reclamation in recent years has come through the attention paid to its social and economic problems. Not all these problems have been solved. Better credit in farm development is needed, broader and more comprehensive plans for determining what crops can be grown and for efficient marketing of products are required.

In addition to the above there is needed closer cooperation between the Federal and State Governments. State interest in the projects located within its borders should be manifested by lessening taxes during the development period, giving aid and advice in making farm improvements and helping these new communities to organize for business and social affairs.

Then there are legal problems. On many streams the irrigated farms line the banks for hundreds of miles. The rights to water and the protection of these rights when rivers are low and water is scarce are essential to prosperity of farmers and the stability and value of irrigation properties. These rights thus far are established and protected under State laws and by State authorities, which is sufficient where streams rise and are used within a State's boundaries. But large rivers cross State boundaries. The watershed of the Colorado include parts of seven States. The Columbia include five and the Missouri six. Federal reclamation works are being operated in 15 of these States. Contracts with settlers have to conform to these laws and to numerous amendments of the original act by Congress. The legal and accounting branches of the Reclamation Bureau confront many difficult problems.

THE WEST URGES NEW DEVELOPMENT

The pressure by localities and States for new works and to complete old ones was never greater than at present. Some now being built have a size and cost not regarded as possible when Federal reclamation began. The Owyhee Dam, now building, will be 405 feet high and will impound water for 125,000 acres of land in Oregon and Idaho. The dam and canals will cost $18,000,000. The Boulder Dam, in the Colorado, recently approved by Congress, will be 700 feet high and will impound water enough to cover the State of Maine to a depth of 1 foot. It will hold the entire flow of the river for a year and a half. Both dams are higher than any now existing. Both, when completed, will be monumental engineering achievements.

The agricultural depression following the Great War caused extreme hardship and loss to settlers on reclamation projects where farms were not fully improved and earning power had not been established. In sections of the country where farms were improved and markets near by farmers lost money and many were unable to meet their obligations. Doing this was still more difficult on reclamation farms, where land still needed to be leveled, where buildings had to be erected and more equipment bought.

Financial difficulties of Federal reclamation project farmers led to an investigation in 1924 and to a writing off of $14,000,000 of the construction indebtedness to the Government. This is about 7 per cent of the total expenditure on reclamation. The payment of $12,000,000 was deferred. Many believed that the deferred payments would also be lost, but some is being paid, and recent events give reason to expect that a considerable part will be.

PROJECTS ARE MEETING THEIR PAYMENTS TO THE GOVERNMENT

The generous action of the Government had a valuable moral effect. It improved the financial outlook of settlers and restored hope and confidence. As a result the payments in 1927 were a million dollars more than those in 1926, and those of 1928 were a million dollars more than those in 1927. On 11 of the projects, 87 to 100 per cent of the construction payments due have been made; on 5 others the percentage ranges from 76 to 84; and there are only 2 projects where less than half the payments due are still owing.

On 17 projects between 92 and 100 per cent of all the operation payments have been made, and on none of them has less than half of the operation payments been made, and on only 3 are the payments less than 90 per cent.

Each year farms become better improved. Each year cultivation becomes more skillful and scientific. The average crop return per acre is now more than two and a half times that of the country as a whole. Reclamation has justified itself by the wealth it has produced and by the influence it has exerted to build up a sound and prosperous life on what, without it, would be unpeopled deserts.

SALE OF COTTON AND GRAIN IN FUTURE MARKETS

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 1093) to prevent the sale of cotton and grain in future markets be made the unfinished business of the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry without amendment.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1593, the bill (H. R. 15712) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the appropriation bill is before the Senate for consideration to-morrow.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF HEALTH

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, in accordance with the notification given by me on yesterday, I rise now to address the Senate on my bill to create a national institute of health. I am entirely willing with this recognition to wait until to-morrow before concluding my address. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, February 5, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

The riches of Thy glory are unsearchable and are not measured by human standards, gracious Father. Far beyond our thoughts and dreams Thy care extends and Thy grace reaches. O Love Divine, fathomable abyss, may our sins be lost in Thee. May we never be afraid. Inspire us to move out on the breast of Thy redemptive mercy. Yes, move out beyond the rim of the twilight; and lo, Thou art there. Words! Words! How they fail us. Oh, that we might be able to tell the shapes of things we can not see. We long for a thousand tongues to sing the great Jehovah's praise. Impart to all of us an insight exceeding abundant, above all we can ask or think. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SNELL, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following report (to accompany House Joint Resolution 398):

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred House Joint Resolution 398, to extend the period of time in which the Secretary of the Interior shall withhold his approval of the adjustment of Northern Pacific land grants, and for other purposes, submits a privileged report on said resolution, with the recommendation that the House joint resolution be adopted.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 31, 1929.

Mr. COLTON introduced the following joint resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, etc., That the first section of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution directing the Secretary of the Interior to withhold his approval of the adjustment of the Northern Pacific land grants, and for other purposes," approved June 5, 1924, as amended by joint resolutions approved March 3, 1927, and May 28, 1928, is amended by striking out "June 30, 1929," wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1930."

The SPEAKER. Referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER NEAR SAVANNA, ILL.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 4787) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Savanna, Ill., and the city of Sabula, Iowa, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands a similar bill has passed the House.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, this bill passed the Senate on January 7, and on the same day a similar bill was passed by the House, and we have to take this action to enact the legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Savanna, Ill., and the city of Sabula, Iowa, authorized to be built by the States of Illinois and Iowa by the act of Congress approved May 26, 1924, as revived and reenacted by act of Congress approved March 10, 1928, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from March 10, 1929.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE DAN RIVER IN VIRGINIA

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 4957) granting the consent of Congress to the Danville & Western Railway Co. to reconstruct, maintain, and operate the existing railroad bridge across the Dan River, in Pittsylvania County, Va., and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

I will state, Mr. Speaker, this bill passed the Senate on January 7 and a similar bill passed the House on the same date.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do the Senate bills contain the provisions that are placed in the House bill?

Mr. DENISON. These are simply extensions of time.

Mr. DYER. The bill does not indicate that.

Mr. DENISON. These bills are of a character that do not require that. One of them is a railroad bridge and the other is an extension of time.

Mr. TILSON. Are they substantially identical with the bill that was passed by the House?

Mr. DENISON. They are.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Danville & Western Railway Co., a corporation of the State of Virginia, its successors and assigns, to reconstruct, maintain, and operate its existing railroad bridge and approaches thereto across the Dan River, at a point 7.8 miles west of Danville, in Pittsylvania County, in the State of Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to the Danville & Western Railway Co., a corporation of the State of Virginia, its successors and assigns; and any corporation to which such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or which shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressely reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TRANSPORTATION OF MAIL BY AIR

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16131) to enable the Postmaster General to make contracts for the transportation of mails by air from island possessions of the United States to foreign countries and to the United States and between such island possessions, and to authorize him to make contracts with private individuals and corporations for the conveyance of mails by air in foreign countries.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman regards this as a matter of emergency?

Mr. KELLY. It is a matter of vital emergency; yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of March 8, 1928, entitled "An act to grant authority to the Postmaster General to enter into contracts for the transportation of mails by air to foreign countries and insular possessions of the United States for periods of not more than 10 years and to pay for such service at fixed rates per pound or per mile, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. When in his judgment the public interest will be promoted thereby the Postmaster General is authorized to enter into contracts for air-mail service on routes between the United States and possessions of the United States, between possessions of the United States, between the United States or possessions of the United States and foreign countries, and in and between foreign countries, for the transportation of mails of the United States and its possessions both ways over the routes, and in addition thereto mails of other countries on the outbound or the inbound flights under arrangements he may make with such countries, for periods of not more than 10 years, and to pay for such service at fixed rates per pound and/or per mile; and the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to award such contracts to the bidders that he shall find to be the lowest responsible bidders that can satisfactorily perform the service required to the best advantage of the Government: Provided, That the rate to be paid for such service for the load of mails provided by the Postmaster General to be carried in a plane shall not in any case exceed $2 per mile each way, plus $3 per pound per thousand miles, or pro rata thereof for greater or less mileage, for any mails required to be carried in the same plane in excess of the specified load, and that, at the request of the Postmaster General, domestic mail shall be conveyed without additional charge on that part of the route in the United States to the border of the United States and to intermediate points: Provided further, That the Postmaster General may make arrangements with concessionaries operating air-mail service in foreign countries for transportation by their service of mails of the United States and its possessions: And provided further, That in the award and interpretation of the contracts herein authorized the decision of the Postmaster General shall be final and not subject to review by any officer or tribunal of the United States except by the President and the Federal courts.

"SEC. 2. The Postmaster General shall make and issue such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 3. All contracts heretofore made by the Postmaster General under section 1 of the act of March 8, 1928, entitled 'An act to grant authority to the Postmaster General to enter into contracts for the transportation of mails by air to foreign countries and insular possessions of the United States for periods of not more than 10 years and to pay for such service at fixed rates per pound or per mile, and for other purposes,' as originally enacted, may be amended under agreement of the parties thereto so as to provide for the transportation of excess mails and for transportation not covered by the existing contract of mails of the United States and its possessions or Territories or of foreign countries, at not exceeding the contract rate per mile and not exceeding the rates per pound provided in section 1 hereof for excess mails."

With the following committee amendments:

On page 2, line 6, after the word "possessions," insert the words "or Territories."

On page 2, line 7 and line 8, after the word "possessions," insert the words "or Territories."

On page 2, line 11, after the word "possessions," insert the words "or Territories."

On page 2, line 23, after the word "plus," strike out the figures "$3" and insert in lieu thereof "not exceeding $1."

On page 3, line 8, after the word "possessions," strike out the colon and insert "or Territories:".

On page 4, line 3, after the word "possessions," insert the words "or Territories."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to enable the Postmaster General to make contracts for the transportation of mails by air from possessions or Territories of the United States to foreign countries and to the United States and between such possessions or Territories and to authorize him to make contracts with private individuals and corporations for the conveyance of mails by air in foreign countries."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, I wish to ascertain what the emergency is and what changes will be made if this bill is passed. I am generally opposed to bringing up these bills by unanimous consent when there is only a handful of Members on the floor of the House. I would also be glad to be informed whether this bill has the unanimous approval of the committee.

Mr. KELLY. In answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin, I will say that this bill is an amendment to the present air mail law. It has the unanimous approval of the Post Office Committee. It is here at the urgent request of the Post Office Department to meet conditions that have arisen since the passage of the original law. It reenacts the foreign air mail law with several provisions that are vitally necessary for the success of the foreign air mail. That service is now being inaugurated. Colonel Lindbergh is to-day flying the first mail plane from Miami to Christobal. However, the Comptroller General has rendered a decision that the original law did not provide for bringing back mail from the foreign countries, from the Central and South American Republics to the United States. It is important, of course, to bring back the mail from these countries as well as to carry mail to them.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. I yield.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. As I caught the reading of the bill, you have one provision in it that would provide that the decision of the Postmaster General as to the terms of contract would be final, except that an appeal may be made to the President or to some court.

Mr. KELLY. That is a reenactment of the law exactly as it now stands.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. That is what I wanted to ascertain. Does the law at the present time contain that exact provision?

Mr. KELLY. It does, word for word. This is a reenactment. Of course, that is for the purpose of having only American companies flying over certain strategic points.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I do not know whether the gentleman understood me. The thought I had in mind is that practically all of the departments object to being overruled by decisions of the Comptroller General. They are anxious to curtail his power. Does this bill contain any language which amends the present law so as to restrict the power of the Comptroller General?

Mr. KELLY. Not a word.

Mr. SCHAFER. If under the present law the Postmaster General's ruling can not be reviewed except by the court or the President, how does the Comptroller General render a decision which makes this an emergency?

Mr. KELLY. The Comptroller General did not rule on the terms of the contract, but upon a word in the original act. He ruled that air-mail service "to" foreign countries did not cover service from them. The contract, however covers flights both ways at the same rate.

Mr. SCHAFER. And this amendment will not clip the authority of the Comptroller General?

Mr. KELLY. Not over the present law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have heard some criticism about the air mail between Texas and Washington. I receive considerable air mail. The mail reaches me one day later than the ordinary mail, and I wondered if the department would work out some plan by which the air mail would be as fast as the ordinary mail.

Mr. KELLY. That is the domestic air mail. I can say to the gentleman that the department is endeavoring to perfect the transmission of the air mail, while realizing that it is still in the pioneer stage.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It occurs to me that the air mail ought to go directly out of Washington instead of being relayed to New York.

Mr. KELLY. The gentleman is quite correct, and considerable mail now goes from Washington.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. What is the necessity of this provision of not submitting any review of the contract except by the President or the court? Why are these contracts any different than other contracts by the Government?

Mr. KELLY. The gentleman knows that certain contracts by the Navy and the War Departments have a similar provision. We have enacted that provision into this law to prevent foreign bidders, however financially responsible, from securing those contracts, with all that that implies.

Mr. DOWELL. It is to protect the department against such a contingency?

Mr. KELLY. That is right.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. I yield.

Mr. NEWTON. This matter comes up as a matter of surprise. It was on the Consent Calendar, way down, and a suggestion was made yesterday that there was a provision in the bill that needed looking into.

We come here now and find it comes up and no objection has been made to it. Do I understand that this permits the granting of a contract without the necessity of giving it to the lowest bidder?

Mr. KELLY. The contract now in force has been let under the law. The provisions of the law are explicit. They have been carried out in letting the contract. The only thing this bill does is to carry out the real purposes of the present law and to enable the Postmaster General to secure mail from Central and South American countries and bring that mail back in these planes. Otherwise he can not do that.

Mr. NEWTON. Bring the mail back in what plane?

Mr. KELLY. In the planes that are carrying our mail now under contract. We have already let a contract under the original law. The Pan American Airways Co. is flying to-day with Colonel Lindbergh blazing the way. He is on the first flight to-day. He can not bring back mail from those countries, although this was one of the purposes of the law.

Mr. NEWTON. In the granting of this right, is it to be granted without reference to submitting it to other people to bid on it?

Mr. KELLY. Oh, no.

Mr. NEWTON. I mean other Americans to bid on it?

Mr. KELLY. All of them have the opportunity to bid. This contract has been let under such conditions.

Mr. NEWTON. Has that been let with the right of all parties to come in and submit bids?

Mr. KELLY. Yes; all bidders that desired to did submit bids.

Mr. SCHAFER. Did the bidders who obtained the contract submit their bids, with the understanding that they could bring the mail back from these foreign countries?

Mr. KELLY. That was the understanding of those originating the law.

Mr. SCHAFER. There would be a difference in the amount of the bid if they did not.

Mr. KELLY. Not so much that. The payment is the same. The Government itself desires to fill these planes with mail and get the advantages for Americans from such speedy communication.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is not the whole proposition only one of a common-sense construction of the law as against a strict construction of the law? We are now unfortunately confronted with a strict construction of the law. This bill is simply to carry out the intent and logic of the bill permitting the contract to carry back mail as well as to take it down there.

Mr. KELLY. That is true.

Mr. TILSON. At any rate, the contract has been entered into and is now in force.

Mr. KELLY. That is the fact.

Mr. SCHAFER. If the bidder when submitting his bid knew that he could not carry back mail, the bid would necessarily be higher, and the proper procedure would be to readvertise for bids if the change contemplated by this bill is made.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They all believed that they were going to carry back mail.

Mr. DOWELL. Does this apply to contracts and bids already made, and contracts entered into?

Mr. KELLY. This simply takes care of the Government's interests. The contractors get no more.

Mr. DOWELL. I mean in the contracts that have already been let.

Mr. KELLY. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not this apply also to future contracts that may be let?

Mr. KELLY. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Then this will apply to any contract that may be let in the future.

Mr. KELLY. Yes; but there is nothing new in this. This does not mean any new policy.

Mr. DYER. That is all provided for in the existing law.

Mr. BEGG. Is not this the case? They let contracts to carry the domestic mail to foreign countries and at present they must come back empty.

Mr. KELLY. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. If this bill is passed, they can pick up mail there and bring it back.

Mr. KELLY. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. That is all it does.

Mr. KELLY. Yes; with certain details as to agreements with companies in foreign countries.

Mr. DOWELL. Does this relate to contracts made abroad for carrying the mail here?

Mr. KELLY. No; these are made all in the United States or possessions or Territories for carrying mail to and from Central and South America. We have found that in Colombia the Colombian Government has given a monopoly contract to a German company, and that company has absolute control over air mail and some agreement must be made with that company if our mail is to be handled in Colombia. We can not do it under the decision of the Comptroller General.

Mr. NEWTON. Where is the occasion for the great haste? Suppose a few days do elapse when these planes do not carry mail back. What is there lost by that delay?

Mr. KELLY. The gentleman understands that we must get action by the House and by the Senate in order to correct the situation by this amendment.

Mr. NEWTON. I do not so understand. It does not seem to me that this ought to be brought up in this way.

Mr. EDWARDS. Why could we not delay the matter and get action in the extra session of Congress?

Mr. KELLY. That would probably mean no more extension of air mail to Central and South American countries, until this amendment could be enacted, although appropriations have been made for such extension.

Mr. EDWARDS. How many routes is the Government itself sustaining by appropriations?

Mr. KELLY. This is one main route. There are three all together, I believe.

Mr. EDWARDS. Then, the Government is not sustaining these entirely by the appropriation?

Mr. KELLY. Oh, no; the appropriations are already made for payments for air mail service only. There is not an additional dollar involved in this amendment. The money is available but can not be used as we expected it to be used after the passage of the original law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is rather important that we have a fair and full understanding now in reference to the significance of this bill.

Mr. KELLY. Of this amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of this amendment. As I understand the gentleman, these contracts were let under existing law?

Mr. KELLY. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the assumption that the Postmaster General had the right to contract not only for carrying domestic mail but the return of foreign mail to the States. Such a contract was entered into by the Post Office Department. It went to the Comptroller General and he held that the law did not authorize the Postmaster General to contract for the return mail. In the meantime the contract had been made, and as I understand this amendment is simply to ratify and confirm the contract made by the Postmaster General in reference to this particular mail contract.

Mr. KELLY. The gentleman understands that the rate under the contract covers both flights, out and back. The disadvantage is in the inability to carry mail back to this country.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no general legislation involved affecting any other air mail?

Mr. KELLY. Not the slightest change of policy.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. I will.

Mr. SCHAFER. Can the gentleman give us the dates that bids were submitted and the contracts let and the date of the Comptroller General's decision so we can be sure that the Comptroller General's decision was made after the contracts were made?

Mr. KELLY. The decision was made shortly after the passage of the act. That act passed March 8, 1928.

Mr. SCHAFER. So the decision was made before the letting of the contract?

Mr. KELLY. It was made after the passage of the law. I am not sure as to the date of the letting of the contract, but that is not the issue involved here.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will object until we get that information. I want to find out if the Comptroller General's decision was made before the contracts were made. If it was, the department and bidders who were given contracts knew that the contracts were not based on the proposition of bringing back mail. If such is the case, the pending bill should be defeated unless provision is made for new bids on the whole proposition.

Mr. KELLY. I hope the gentleman will not object to this important amendment, which should be made at once.

Mr. SCHAFER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for further consideration of the bill H. R. 16714, the naval appropriation bill; and pending that I ask unanimous consent that the time be controlled equally by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] and by myself. It is my understanding both sides have used about the same amount of time, but I desire to ask the Speaker what the record shows.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho has consumed 3 hours and 29 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas 3 hours and 10 minutes.

Mr. FRENCH. The time to be equalized so that at the conclusion of debate both sides will have used the same amount of time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16714, and pending that asks that the time for general debate be equally divided between himself and the gentleman from Kansas, with the understanding that it be equalized so that at the conclusion of the day the same amount of time will be consumed by both sides. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16714, the naval appropriation bill, with Mr. LUCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16714, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16714) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I shall be glad to have the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] consume some of his time.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in the Post this morning I find an article which recites that the Veterans' Association last evening at their banquet indorsed a program of legislation including the immediate passage of the cruiser bill and matters in which the disabled are interested.

I just want to take occasion to say that that is entirely in error. The Veterans' Association of the House and Senate, composed of veterans of all wars, is strictly a social organization.

We never have taken and we never will take a position on legislation as an association. It is simply an annual function where we entertain the commanders of the different service organizations each year. That was the occasion last evening. At no time did we collectively or individually express any opinion whatever as to any matter of legislation.

I thought it was in order for me to make a correction at this time. [Applause.] I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McMILLAN] 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I shall, when the naval appropriation bill is read under the 5-minute rule, offer an amendment on page 32, line 23, to provide for the extension of the dry dock at Charleston, S. C.

We have a dry dock now at the Charleston Navy Yard that is 566 feet in length. This dry dock was built in 1908, I believe it was, at an expenditure of $1,250,000. It is the only dry dock, my friends, that we have on the entire section of coast from Cape Hatteras, N. C., to the Mexican border at Brownsville, Tex. This is a distance of some 3,000 miles of coast line from Cape Hatteras to the Mexican border. It is the only dry dock, as I have said, for that entire stretch of coast.

I have here, gentlemen of the House, a map of the world [exhibiting]. This map comes to me from the Navy Department. It shows the naval bases and stations of the British Empire, the United States, and Japan. You will find here on this map the naval bases of Great Britain. They are some 25 in number at various points of strategic importance throughout the world. It is down here in the lower section of the South Atlantic that I desire to call to your particular attention. Down here in the South Atlantic waters in the Caribbean Sea and in the Gulf of Mexico and that area adjacent to the Panama Canal you will find that the British Empire has three different distinct naval bases. At Bermuda they have a navy yard and naval facilities and facilities for naval fuel oil, and is a defended fortification of the British Empire. Down here at Kingston, just north of the Panama Canal, in the Caribbean Sea, and off here at Fort Castris is still another.

Now, I am not criticizing Great Britain nor any other country for establishing these naval bases where they believe them to be of strategic importance in the world; but, nevertheless, regardless of what their position is or the wisdom of establishing those bases, the fact remains that here in the South Atlantic area those naval bases are established.

Now, there must be some important reason for that situation. What do we find here on the eastern coast of America? You will find, according to this map of the Navy Department, that north of Cape Hatteras, from Norfolk, Va., to Portsmouth, N. H., there is 530 miles of coast line, and in this 530 miles of coast there are 8 navy yards, and those 8 navy yards have 17 dry docks; and yet to the south of Hatteras, as far south as Brownsville, Tex., a distance of some three thousand miles, we have at Charleston the only navy yard, and the one dry dock, 566 feet long.

Now, you may inquire why I am asking for this amendment. I am asking for it, gentlemen of the House, because the cruisers that we are now building and the cruisers that are contemplated under the new cruiser-building program are about 610 feet in length. We have at this dry dock at Charleston a length of only 566 feet. In other words, we lack about 60 feet from having enough length in the one dry dock that we have available on the entire section of coast to take care of the cruisers now building and those contemplated to be built. In other words, we are buying a horse with no stable to put it in.

My friends, you have already heard here this morning, in connection with the bill that has just been discussed on this floor about foreign air-mail routes that are being opened up between America and the South and Central American countries. Colonel Lindbergh, as has been stated on the floor to-day, is now blazing a trail at this very moment to the south. President-elect Hoover, a month or so ago, made a 10,000-mile trip through these countries. What is the purpose? It is for no other reason but to expand the business relations between us and the West Indies and the South and Central American countries.

In the last two or three years the trade, commerce, and business relations of this country have so increased in the South and Central American countries that to-day there is an annual trade of some $2,000,000,000, and it does not require any great stretch of the imagination to realize that within the next few years this trade, business, and commerce will continue to increase between the United States of America and the Central and South American countries as one of the largest to be found anywhere in the world. This is absolutely true and no one will attempt to deny it.

Now, with this increase of trade and the expansion of commerce to the south, it naturally follows that the people of the world, whether they be British, Japanese, or any other people, are going to vie with the United States of America in that trade and in the expansion of that commerce.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. Does the gentleman know of any privately owned dry dock in that immense stretch of country which would take care of any of these modern large vessels?

Mr. McMILLAN. In answer to the gentleman I will say I do not know of a single one.

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not.

Mr. McMILLAN. I might say, in further response to the question asked by the gentleman, that the dry dock at Charleston, S. C., is the only dry dock owned by the Navy Department in the South. The Navy Department did have a floating dock at New Orleans, but through a bill which was recently passed that dock has been leased to private interests, and that dock, too, I may say, is only 525 feet long. Therefore, even though it were not disposed of, it would not be of sufficient size to take care of the naval vessels now contemplated.

Mr. EDWARDS. In the event that one of the naval ships on which we are spending so many millions of dollars should get into distress while cruising around Savannah, Ga., Charleston, S. C., or Jacksonville, Fla., what would it have to do in order to go into dry dock?

Mr. McMILLAN. It would have to go some 2,000 miles to some of these northern yards. This last year, I may say to the gentleman, the Arkansas, one of the battleships, was going down from the Philadelphia Navy Yard to Guantanamo on what is known as a shake-down cruise. That battleship suffered an accident. One of the main bearings for some reason went out of commission near the city of Charleston. The battleship was helpless, and it was brought into the port of Charleston, where it was repaired. It was estimated, I will say to my friend from Georgia, that it would have taken $12,000 to tow that ship back to some yard which had a dock capable of taking care of it.

Mr. EDWARDS. What will be the total expense in connection with increasing the length of this dry dock?

Mr. McMILLAN. Three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. EDWARDS. That amount will modernize and make useful this dry dock at Charleston for governmental purposes.

Mr. McMILLAN. The gentleman is absolutely correct. Now, my friends, I have mentioned the fact that this trade expansion in the South and Central American countries would necessarily result in having every country vie with the United States in securing some of that trade. That is a human trait among individuals and countries. When that becomes true then our fleet, which is primarily organized and maintained for the purpose of the defense of our country and our commerce, is going to have to spend a great deal of its time around this section of the world. That is absolutely natural. And what will you find when that happens? You will find that our fleet, and every ship of the fleet, will be thousands of miles away from a dry dock that is capable of taking care of the ships of the fleet in the event of a great emergency.

I am very serious about this situation. I have the honor to represent a section of my State in this body, and I am appealing to you men as Americans and as representatives of the American people to help me in securing the adoption of this amendment, which I shall offer under the 5-minute rule.

As I have said before, we have from Norfolk to Portsmouth, N. H., 17 dry docks. I have no complaint to make about that section of the country if these dry docks are needed for the Naval Establishment, nor have I any complaint to make about the money invested in those various naval facilities if same are considered as necessary. But, my friends, I do say that if those 17 dry docks and if those 8 navy yards are necessary on a coast line of 530 miles, then I say in the next breath that it is equally as important that 3,000 miles of the same country is entitled to at least some consideration from the American Government.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. How far from this Charleston dock is it to the next dry dock to the north?

Mr. McMILLAN. Some six or seven hundred miles.

Mr. ARNOLD. And what is the nearest one?

Mr. McMILLAN. The next nearest dock to the north is at Norfolk, Va., and it is about 600 miles by water from Charleston to that point. I will further say to my friend that in going from Charleston to Norfolk, or any point north, you must go by Cape Hatteras, and everybody knows that Cape Hatteras is the boneyard of the Atlantic.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Has the gentleman any figures as to the length of the dry dock in the yards north of Charleston?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman give us the benefit of those figures?

Mr. McMILLAN. At Portsmouth, N. H., we have one dock and the length of that dock is 740 feet. At Boston we have two docks. One dock is 375 feet and the other is 739 feet.

Then you have at Boston another dock known as the Commonwealth Dock, 1,176 feet long.

At New York we have five docks ranging in length from 349 feet to 694 feet.

At Philadelphia there are three docks, ranging in length from 491 feet to 1,011 feet; the 1,011-foot dock is now about 50 per cent completed.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman state how many of these docks are owned by the Government?

Mr. McMILLAN. All of them. Every one of these docks is owned by the Government under the Navy Department.

At Norfolk there are six docks. Four of them are operated by the Navy Department, and they vary in length from 324 feet to 1,011 feet. On the Navy property at Norfolk there are two other docks that are now controlled by the Emergency Fleet Corporation of 465 feet each.

As I have said, there are 17 docks, mind you, over a stretch of coast of 530 miles, whereas south of Hatteras to Brownsville, Tex., 3,000 miles, we have only 1 available dock of 566 feet in length.

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes.

Mr. WELLER. Is it not a fact that the United States Shipping Board has to send the Leviathan to Boston, as it is the only dry dock that is large enough or the only one that is available to handle the Leviathan?

Mr. McMILLAN. That is absolutely correct.

My friends, I want to emphasize——

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes.

Mr. TABER. What is the largest ship that can now enter that dock?

Mr. McMILLAN. The Charleston dock?

Mr. TABER. Yes. Can the 7,500-ton light cruiser go in there?

Mr. McMILLAN. I may say to my friend that it depends on the length. In other words, we have a dock there 566 feet long. I do not know the size or the weight of the ship that can go in there, but if it is more than 566 feet long it can not be handled there.

Mr. TABER. What is the depth of your dock?

Mr. McMILLAN. Thirty-one feet. I will say to my friend that the Utah, I think, or one of our battleships, has been in that dock, but it depends altogether on the length of the ship.

I want to emphasize this fact. The Navy Department is a department of this Government for the purpose of maintaining a fleet of ships for what purpose? For the purpose of the defense of our country and for the defense of our shipping interests, our trade, and our commerce. Therefore, having ships with a cruising radius, such as our ships have, of thousands of miles, it stands to reason that such ships of the Navy are just as apt to be down in the southern waters as they are in the northern waters or in any other waters.

Why, right to-day the Pacific Fleet and the Atlantic Fleet are all centered down off of Panama carrying on their winter maneuvers. This being true, when we consider that these ships sometimes go out of commission, why is it not possible for us to have down here [indicating on map] where these ships are a great deal of the time, a facility in the way of a dry dock to take care of and provide for them?

We have here in the Gulf of Mexico and in the Caribbean Sea a squadron known as the Special Service Squadron, of some six or eight ships that stay down there the entire year. Where are those ships carried?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. McMILLAN. These ships of the Special Service Squadron, instead of being sent to Charleston where we have this yard and have the facilities for taking care of them, pass right by our yard and are sent up to some northern yard for repairs.

My friends, I am talking to you this morning from the standpoint of the national interest, and this is a national problem. It is not a sectional problem with me. I am trying to look at this matter from the standpoint of the national defense, and here is a map that bears me out in my statement.

I now desire to call your attention to some significant figures. The entire money expended for all east coast naval shore establishments, from the establishment of any individual station, up to 1919, north of Cape Hatteras, this stretch of coast of 530 miles in length—the entire amount spent by this Government was $632,000,000, whereas south of Hatteras a coast line of 3,000 miles, up to 1919, there was expended by the Government $76,000,000. This is up to 1919.

Now, let us see what has happened since 1919. Listen to this. In the last 10 years there has been expended $852,000,000 on shore establishments for the Navy, making an increase of $220,000,000, from Cape Hatteras to Portsmouth, N. H., whereas south of Cape Hatteras to the Mexican border there has been spent $82,000,000, an increase of only $6,000,000. In other words, according to these figures, there has been spent by the Government $220,000,000 for costs, maintenance, and operation on shore stations for 530 miles of coast to the north of Hatteras, as against $6,000,000 to the south of Hatteras, representing a coast line of 3,000 miles. Is there any justification for such a program?

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. McMILLAN. I shall be pleased to yield.

Mr. AYRES. I was out of the Chamber for a while and if the gentleman has explained this I do not care for him to repeat it. Has the gentleman called attention to the fact as to whether there is any navy yard along that coast line with the exception of Charleston?

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not know that I have made myself clear on that point, but I shall be pleased to state that the Charleston Navy Yard is the only yard we now have in operation south of Hatteras to the Mexican border.

Mr. AYRES. About how many miles?

Mr. McMILLAN. About 3,000 miles. There was a yard at New Orleans, but that yard for some years has been out of commission and the dry dock at that point, which was a floating dock, has since been leased by authority of law to private interests.

There is a naval training station at Pensacola, Fla., but at that point there is no facility, no navy yard, or no dry dock, or any other facility to provide for the protection or the maintenance of a ship in time of trouble.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. McMILLAN. I yield.

Mr. DENISON. Can the gentleman inform us how many navy yards or dry docks there are on the Pacific coast?

Mr. McMILLAN. There are three, I understand; one at Bremerton, one at Puget Sound, and one at Mare Island. I am not going to take any more time of the committee this morning, but when this bill is read, and when my amendment is in order, I am going to ask Members here representing various sections of the United States to stand with me on this proposition. It is not sectional, it is not offered because I have the honor to represent this section of the country, but because, as I have undertaken to show you, our trade and our commerce and our people everywhere are looking to the South, and the Central and South American countries, for an expansion of trade. Our commerce is growing there in leaps and bounds, and we have got to protect and defend it by looking out for our naval defenses as the first line of defense for the people of our country.

Two years ago I called the attention of the House to this situation. Take the RECORD and see what Admiral Anderson, one of the most distinguished admirals of the Navy, said a few years ago about this dry-dock situation in Charleston. He said:

> Regarding the question of a dry dock, there are three reasons why, in my opinion, such a dock should be located south of Hatteras. My study of strategy makes me firmly of the opinion that in any naval war in which this country may become involved in the Atlantic the battle would probably be fought south of Cape Hatteras, in which case a harbor with a deep channel and dry dock capable of receiving disabled ships would be absolutely indispensable. This phase of the question, however, has undoubtedly been presented to the committee over and over again, and I will not waste your time by discussing it further.

Second. I was in command of the American Patrol Detachment during the war, and my mission was to safeguard American and allied interests in the Carribbean and Gulf of Mexico. In preparing my "Estimate of the situation" I found that about 1,500,000 tons of shipping passed through the Straits of Florida each way monthly and, after the submarines appeared off our coasts, was routed by Charleston. Had the commanding officers of the German submarines been of the same caliber as those during the first year of the war, and had they handled their vessels with nerve, they would have attacked this shipping proceeding along our coast and done immense damage to it. In addition to sinking there would have been many vessels injured both by mines and torpedoes which would have been able to limp into the port of Charleston; and if we had a deep waterway and a dry dock capable of taking these damaged vessels, the dock would have more than paid for itself.

Without this dock and under such conditions we would have been absolutely swamped. As the submarine is essentially the weapon of a weak naval power and it is by no means impossible that unscrupulous use of this weapon against merchant shipping might be repeated in the future, it seems to me to be the part of wisdom to provide against it as far as possible.

Now that is what Admiral Anderson said, talking about the advisability of having a dry dock available for ships put out of commission in any emergency.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. What does the gentleman consider as the reason why the Navy has not provided a dry dock for this 3,000 miles of coast line that he speaks of?

Mr. McMILLAN. It is not the Navy Department so much as Members of Congress not providing the appropriation. Every naval authority that I have been able to find realizes the importance of having a dry dock south of Hatteras and the advisability and importance of having a first-rate naval base at that point.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I am not unfriendly to the gentleman's proposition, but has the Navy Department ever recommended an appropriation for this purpose?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes; in 1918, I think it was, an act of Congress was passed authorizing the construction of an additional dry dock at Charleston, but like many other projects we have never been able to get it.

Mr. Chairman, my time has about expired, but before I conclude may I again urge upon the membership of this House the absolute merit of my proposed amendment? I have made an honest effort to present the facts covering this subject to you without the slightest feeling of sectionalism, or of party difference, but as a Representative of the Congress, representing what I conceive to be to the interest of the American people. I shall confidently count upon your enthusiastic support when my amendment is presented for consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman and fellow Members, I have listened with great interest to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McMILLAN] as he presented his case, and I am sure you all have been impressed, as I have been, that he has ably made a good case for the dry dock extension at Charleston. [Applause.]

There is one other thing which I might call to your attention, which he did not call to your attention, which I think is important. The dry docks at and north of Norfolk during a hard winter are liable to have a great deal of interference from ice, especially on the northern coast. You can very well imagine a situation under present conditions where the country might be without an available dry dock on the entire Atlantic coast during a severe freeze, unless the one at Charleston is modernized.

This is a peculiar situation; 535 miles of coast north of Hatteras, north of Norfolk, with this great number of navy yards and dry docks, with only one dry dock south of Norfolk. Why a dry dock if you do not intend to use it, if we do not think we are going to have to use it? Ah, my friends, there is this situation we can not get away from. There has been and is a discrimination, and you know it and I know it, and the discrimination ought not to any longer exist, no matter who is to blame, whether it be the Navy Department or the members of the Naval Committee or the Members of the House. We ought to right the wrong, and we ought to do it now. We ought to vote this extension of that dry dock at Charleston, S. C., not merely because Mr. McMILLAN, one of the most amiable Members of the House, is asking for it, but because the United States Government needs it, and we know the Government needs it. [Applause.]

It entails a cost of $300,000 to do what? To make available and modern an investment of the Government, that is already there, of considerably over a million dollars in that dry dock, which is growing obsolete. Unless we do this very thing that Mr. McMILLAN is calling upon us to do, that dry dock, the property of the Government, representing an investment of over a million dollars, will be absolutely obsolete in a very short time. The big commercial vessels and the big naval vessels can not be repaired and overhauled there because the dry dock is too short. There is a great natural harbor, that God has given to our country, at Charleston. We have there a navy yard and we have there a dry dock, that will soon be of little or no value, and we have invested in that dry dock over a million dollars. With an expenditure of $300,000 more, we can bring that up to date and make of it a modern dry dock, so that this stretch of coast covering a distance of approximately 3,000 miles will be equipped with an available and modern dry dock for the American fleet and for large American commercial vessels. The southern ports like Charleston, Savannah, Brunswick, Jacksonville, and Wilmington are growing in commercial importance by leaps and bounds. The spindles and other industries are coming from States like Massachusetts, and other Northern States, to this gentle year-around working climate, where we have conditions under which work can be carried on during the entire year. As Mr. McMILLAN has said, it is not a sectional matter, it is not an appeal from the South, it is not an appeal from the great State of South Carolina, but it is an appeal in the interest of our great common country. I, for one, am ready to back up this worthy proposition, and I hope the Committee on Naval Affairs will see fit to accept Mr. McMILLAN's amendment, and let us do this very much needed thing and extend that dry dock and make of it a modern equipment for Government vessels.

It is a matter of simple justice and in the interest of economy. It is common sense, too, that dictates it should be done. Why the Navy Department is not insisting upon this being done, I can not understand. This is our job here and we know a modern dry dock is needed and needed badly on the South Atlantic. This one at Charleston can be extended and modernized at a great saving to the Government, and it should no longer be delayed. Mr. McMILLAN's amendment should be adopted when it is reached.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] 10 minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, about a week ago or more we passed here a bill to regulate the cotton exchanges of this country. We followed the lines which were followed by the grain people of the West when they put through a bill to regulate the grain exchanges. It so well commended itself to the judgment of this House that that measure was needed, that it was at least a step in the right direction, that the bill actually passed the House by unanimous consent, on the Consent Calendar, without hiding its head under a bushel, but after full exposition of its intention and its purpose. This House passed the bill unanimously. I am a cotton farmer myself and have been so for many years. I have not undertaken to farm the farmer, but I do realize when I am hit. I have been hit a good many times by the manipulations of the price of cotton on the cotton exchange. Therefore I am in sympathy with anything that moves in that direction.

What do we find? That bill, of course, has to pass another body, and it has to pass between now and the 4th of March, or it does not become law. The friends of the cotton farmer are doing what? I find an interview in which in the first place it is said that the cotton exchanges have made up their minds to reform themselves, and therefore that no legislation should be enacted pending this house cleaning of its own—this self-constituted reform. Well, it takes something more than a resolution of the cotton exchanges to convince me that there has been a change of heart. The faith that would sit down and expect a reform in the methods of sandbagging the cotton farmer by manipulations of cotton exchanges in this country is a faith such as we read of in Holy Writ—that will remove mountains. I do not know of any other class of faith that is entitled to be held up alongside of it. You may as well expect the association of bootleggers in the city of Chicago to reform itself, to cast out evildoers, and organize a church and start out to redeem the country in a religious way.

That is all I have to say about this question of self-reformation of the cotton exchanges of New York and New Orleans. Oh, they say they have already established a southern delivery. Yes; and they have put a penalty of $1.25 on every bale that is delivered on southern delivery. That is how they are establishing southern delivery. It is said, "They are also putting a limitation on how much any one man can deal in in cotton on the exchange in any one month." Who enforces it? Who sees to the inforcement of that salutary rule? Why, the committee of the exchange itself sees to it, and the biggest operators, the ones that operate in the most voluminous way, are the fellows that will be controlling the board of control, and they are the fellows who would be violating the rule if anybody is, and they will surely put it high enough so that they can operate all they want to. Oh, no; this talk of their reformation is absolute rot and I do not care who maintains it. I do not care who uses it as a sandbag with which to kill this legislation; the cotton farmers of the South, having once gotten a bill through this House which commended itself to them, are going to hold somebody responsible for its sandbagging in the Senate if it is sandbagged.

The other reason assigned for inaction is that the Agricultural Department, operating under this bill, does not know enough to do it. That is a confession of a want of ability on the part of the American Government to handle its own business. The Department of Agriculture has been studying the question of cotton for many years. It has been attempting to enforce a defective law which was passed some 10 or 15 years ago, and some of these days it will be declared unconstitutional because its twin brother has been. It has been showing its ability to enforce that as far as it goes, but the law was not sufficient to make a sufficient enforcement of it possible. Gentlemen who talk about the Department of Agriculture not being capable of enforcing the law will have to remember, the people who say that, that that very Department of Agriculture on the very question of cotton itself has several times confounded the gentlemen.

You remember in 1926 or 1927 we had a very large crop. The Department of Agriculture predicted a large crop. They first predicted rather modestly. As the season went on and the crop developed they raised the estimate. The 1st of December they had their prediction up. People were astounded, prices went down, but the prediction of the department was not changed and some of the gentlemen who talk about the inability of the Department of Agriculture called a meeting of the cotton people and talked us almost to death about the iniquity of the exaggerated reports coming from the Department of Agriculture, and tried to point out the excessive reports which had been made. However, the ginning reports of the year of the number of bales of cotton completely counted showed that there were nearly 100,000 more bales actually than the Government had predicted, and the gentlemen had missed it by nearly 2,000,000 bales and the Government had missed it by only 100,000. Now we are trying to curb and run out of business these fellows who are trying to rob the cotton farmers of the country. At least we are entitled to try what the grain people have tried. I do not know whether this will do it or not. I have not heard much of a holler about it. I have heard some people speculate in grain and demoralize the market, but at any rate we have the right to say, if we are going to have a law, let us have one made by the Congress of the United States and enforced by the powers of the Agricultural Department of the United States, and not one made by the cotton exchanges themselves and enforced by them and in the interest of those cotton exchanges, whose interests are not the interests of those who raise the cotton.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will.

Mr. KVALE. Does the gentleman think the grain gamblers and speculators will ever permit such a bill to become a law?

Mr. STEVENSON. Well, I am just declaiming now against these strongholds of the cotton gamblers——

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does the gentleman believe that these cotton exchanges are going to be willing to live up to these promises they have made unless we have a law that will force them to do it?

Mr. STEVENSON. Why, it is childish to suppose that they will. They have never regarded any law that ever was passed, either by State or Nation, unless there was a sanction whereby you can enforce it. The idea of their making a law of their own and enforcing it is absolutely ridiculous.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the few words that I have to say, which will be more in the form of an interrogatory than anything else, relate entirely to the naval bill. I am interested particularly in getting information. I believe there is more discussion on the subject of the naval bill and of the naval strength of this country and other countries and less real information than on any other subject before Congress. There are controversies at both ends of the Capitol as to what the facts are. I am interested in the report accompanying this bill. It says on page 3:

> The committee seriously questions the wisdom of keeping in commission and operating all of the ships embraced by the operating force plan. (See p. 83 of hearings.) It has found, however, that curtailed appropriations have had little influence on the policy in that regard. There are two courses open to us: Either adequately to provide for operating everything at tremendous extra cost, or, if the Navy itself will not tie up ships, for the Congress specifically to provide what ships shall be operated, so that the savings thus effected may be used properly to take care of the vessels remaining in commission, which includes, of course, additional outlays for the shore establishment.

What ships are to be operated, and what of those that are to be tied up?

This bill provides for over $350,000,000 outlay for naval purposes the coming year, and in common with every other Member of the House I want to express the thanks we owe to this committee that undertakes this work and seeks to provide what Congress demands with as little waste as possible. But here is a question, Mr. Chairman, and I ask the committee's attention to this, in order to know what the facts are. I do not know that you can inform us so that we will understand. I do not know that your committee agree among themselves. I know that those at the other end of the Capitol do not agree as to the facts, notwithstanding we have just begun a $270,000,000 additional expenditure for 15 new cruisers. But here is a comparison that has come to my mind. I ask the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee in charge of this bill [Mr. FRENCH], for whom we all have a great deal of respect, not only for his judgment but for his fairness, to explain, if he will, the statement that was made on January 3 by an eminent naval expert, on page 1080 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, concerning the strength of this Government in cruisers compared with those of Japan and of the British Empire.

In that statement the United States is quoted as having built 10 cruisers, and is building 8 more, with a total tonnage of 155,000 tons. Below, on the same page, is Japan, which is given, according to this table, a rating of 213,000 or 214,000 tons in round numbers; nearly 50 per cent more tonnage than we have; and Great Britain, on the same page, is given 397,000 tons, more than twice the cruiser tonnage we have.

I read the arguments at the time, as did many other Members of the House, to find out what is obsolete, and what is obsolescent, and what the 20-year range means, but finally I gave up the subject in discouragement. I am not the only one in that situation. Experts themselves differ, and I refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of no longer ago than yesterday, wherein a naval expert, I assume, on page 2620 of the RECORD, said the British have no ships at all equal to ours, and these are the ships he quoted. He gave the names of the Maryland, of 32,600 tons; the California, of 32,300 tons; the Tennessee, of 32,300 tons; the Idaho, of 32,000 tons; the New Mexico, of 32,000 tons; the Mississippi, of 32,000 tons; the Arizona, of 31,400 tons; and the Pennsylvania, of 31,400 tons.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FREAR. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. FREAR. When the Member from the other legislative body had concluded his statement that the British have no ships equal to ours—and that was stated in a parliamentary body equal to ours—another Member of that body who had made the statement in the RECORD of January 3 of the relative strength of the United States in cruisers, added yesterday this other statement:

> Under the standard tonnage on which the figures are now computed on the same basis as ours the British have battle cruisers, the Hood, 42,100 tons; the Repulse, 32,000 tons; the Renown, 32,000 tons; the Valiant, the Queen Elizabeth, and the War Spite, of 31,000 tons; and the Barham and Malaya of 31,000 tons.

There was a difference of opinion yesterday that was not settled, and others present in that Chamber were at a disagreement with the conclusions.

Now, if experts on that side disagree on cruisers and battleships, we on this side of the Capitol must get what information we can from our own experts. Recently the President made a statement that our Navy was as strong as any other. At that time I understood it included destroyers and submarines and all other craft. But here we have under discussion the general strength of the Navy, where comparisons are made and disputes occur constantly. While I do not believe it is necessary for us to compare our Navy with England or with Japan or with any other country, and I do not see any danger of war, I think the Members of this House are entitled to the best opinion that can be had as to the comparative strength not only of our cruisers but of all the American Navy, as compared with that of other governments.

Mr. KVALE. I would like to have the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] answer those questions which the gentleman from Wisconsin propounded.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to myself 10 minutes, to be charged to my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I shall undertake to answer the two questions the gentleman has asked in the reverse order of the way in which they have been propounded. The latter question has to do with battleships and the former with cruisers. In the matter of battleships, as the Members of the House know, the treaty that was ratified nearly six years ago, known as the limitation of armaments treaty, prescribed the number and tonnage of ships of this type for Great Britain, the United States, Japan, France, and Italy. These ships were denominated capital ships. The ideal tonnage set up for Great Britain and the United States was 525,000 tons and the number of capital ships was fixed at 18 for each of these two nations. More than that, no capital ship was to be built in the future with a greater tonnage than 35,000, excepting as set forth in the treaty. However, at the time the conference was held the battleships of the two nations were not alike as to tonnage or as to age, and so an approximate tonnage only was agreed upon. Also, pending replacement that was provided for, the number of ships of the battleship class was not limited to 18. The United States was permitted to retain 18 ships, of which 2 were to be replaced by 2 battleships that were being constructed at the time, and Great Britain was permitted to retain 22 battleships and battle cruisers, 4 of which were to be withdrawn and their places taken by 2 battleships that Great Britain was permitted to lay down.

Under this arrangement the United States has added to her list of capital ships the West Virginia and the Colorado. These two ships have been completed since the conference, have taken their places in the fleet, and we have dismantled and scrapped the North Dakota and the Delaware in compliance with the treaty. The United States to-day has 18 battleships, with a total tonnage displacement of 525,850 tons.

Great Britain under the treaty was permitted to retain 22 capital ships pending the construction of 2 battleships. Upon the completion of these ships and their induction into the British Navy Great Britain was required to withdraw four of her oldest battleships named in the treaty from her naval establishment and destroy them, just as we were required to destroy two of ours.

This work has been completed and to-day Great Britain has 20 battleships and battle cruisers of an indicated tonnage of 556,350 tons.

As you have followed me you have noticed that Great Britain has two more ships of the capital-ship type than has the United States and a somewhat greater tonnage. All this was understood at the time of the conference and was agreed to in order to equalize the relative strength of the two nations when age of ships and effectiveness were considered.

Under the terms of the treaty, as time will pass and replacement occur, Great Britain and the United States will reduce still further their battleships, until they will have 15 capital ships each with a total tonnage not exceeding 525,000 tons.

In other words, as you study the tables showing the comparative naval strength of Great Britain and the United States, wherever there appears a difference in tonnage or a difference in numbers of ships in the capital-ship class, it is because of a concession one way or the other on account of older types of ships and their relative effectiveness, the understanding being that at all times, both before and after replacement, the capital ships of the two nations would be equally matched.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. There are three classes of ships included, as I understand—the battleship, the battle cruiser, and the cruiser.

Mr. FRENCH. No; not in what we are now discussing. The cruiser of which I shall speak presently is not a capital ship. At the time of the limitations conference the United States had battleships and Great Britain had battleships and battle cruisers, ships quite comparable though not identical. These two types are the only two that we need consider under the capital-ship or battleship class.

Mr. FREAR. This very question was discussed yesterday in another body, but I think it is not understood by the average Member. It was said that Great Britain now has, as I understand it—and this is by the chairman of a Naval Committee—the Hood, 42,000 tons; the Repulse, 32,000 tons; the Renown, 32,000 tons; the Valiant, the Queen Elizabeth, and the Warspite, 31,000 tons; and two others of 31,000 tons. Now, I am asking the gentleman from Idaho to give the House the benefit of his better understanding. It is whispered to me that those figures are not correct at all; but those figures were given yesterday in the parliamentary body mentioned. Now, I want to ask what is the difference between a battleship and a battle cruiser so far as their effectiveness is concerned; and what is the difference between the comparative strength of our Navy—every branch of the Navy—as compared with the strength of Great Britain and Japan, for instance, where the 5-5-3 ratio operates?

Mr. FRENCH. The battleships and the battle cruisers were grouped together as capital ships. Both are ships of the heavy-tonnage class, running from 21,850 to 42,500 tons, protected by heavy armor, and carrying heavy armaments, with heavy long-range guns. They are veritable floating batteries. Of the two the battle cruiser is a ship of greater speed and lighter armor. When it came to arranging ships from the English fleet to stand as comparable to the 18 battleships of our fleet it was permitted that Great Britain should retain several of the so-called battle cruisers, we knowing they were lighter in armament but of greater speed. Great Britain has four so-called battle cruisers. The point that we must now bear in mind is that the experts of both countries at the armaments conference regarded the battleships to be retained by the United States as equal to or comparable to the battleships and battle cruisers to be retained by Great Britain.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman please make it clear—because it is always misrepresented—that when you are talking about the capital ships of England you include battle cruisers with battleships?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; that is what I have just said.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Please make that clear, because that is constantly being confused.

Mr. FRENCH. I have tried to make it clear that for the purpose of the agreement certain battleships and certain battle cruisers of Great Britain were included in the number of capital ships that were regarded as comparable to the battleships to be retained by the United States.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman has constantly referred to the idea of replacement. I do not want to intimate that the gentleman from Idaho is a large-navy man at all, but all these large-navy people are constantly using the idea of replacement as a reason for a large navy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 more minutes. This discussion is certainly pertinent to the bill.

I think I can make clear to my colleague the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE] what is meant by the word "replacement" as I have used it and as it is used in the treaty.

As I said in my general discussion of this question the other day, there is a length of life of all types of ships beyond which they are not regarded as having military value. Upon this theory, when it comes to the point where the length of life is about to expire, replacement is necessary if an equivalent fighting unit is to be maintained. In the treaty that was adopted nearly six years ago, it is provided that when certain battleships reach a certain age—and in the treaty it is specifically pointed out what dates are the dates that may be regarded as the termination of the length of life—replacement may be had upon the part of the nations to whose naval establishment the ships belong. It does not mean that these nations may add tonnage. It means they may replace only by withdrawing ships from commission and substituting other ships in their place.

There is this further thought in connection with the question of replacement. Under the treaty, since the United States and Great Britain both did not have capital ships in numbers (18) that would work out exactly 525,000 tons, it was provided that until this replacement could work out as to certain ships both nations could have the privilege of having somewhat more tonnage than 525,000.

Mr. KVALE. But what I refer to is the fact that some of the large-navy people claim that even the 15-cruiser program is a replacement. What does the gentleman say about that?

Mr. FRENCH. Let me answer that briefly and then go to the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Personally, I regard the construction of these ships as replacement. There are others who do not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But it does not come under the treaty.

Mr. FRENCH. No; this has nothing to do with the treaty.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. May I not call attention to the fact that Britain has actually replaced some of her older battleships by the Lord Nelson class of two, which are, in fact, replacements?

Mr. FRENCH. That is true. The battleships that Great Britain has added to her capital ships have been replacements under the treaty just as the two added by the United States to her list of battleships or capital ships are replacement ships, we withdrawing two old ones that were no longer to be regarded as part of our Navy, and they were destroyed.

Now, I come to the question that was asked first by the gentleman from Wisconsin. He has referred to the different figures used for tonnage of the ships of Great Britain and the United States, and has referred to ships of the first line and the second line, as I understood the question.

The gentleman has also referred to a table that was used in the debates in the Senate on January 3, page 1056, as the RECORD seems to indicate.

I think the confusion that exists in the Congress and in the press touching the question of relative strength of the United States and other countries in cruisers is in large part the result of using two different formulas in heading the list of so-called first-line and second-line cruisers for the United States and other countries.

For instance, if you will turn to the hearings of a year ago, you will find there were formulas to this effect: Light cruisers of the first line were cruisers with 5 to 8 inch guns, 3,000 to 10,000 tons, of 27 knots plus. The light cruisers of the second line were cruisers with 8-inch guns minus, 3,000 to 8,000 tons, and 27 knots minus, while cruisers of the second line were those defined as having 8-inch guns plus, 8,000 tons plus, and 27 knots minus.

Last year the list that was made up for the United States, Great Britain, Japan, France, and Italy used the formulas to which I have referred. This year, in the table to which the gentleman has directed attention, different formulas have been used, namely, for cruisers of the first line, a formula reciting, "under effective age of 20 years"; and for the second line, "over effective age of 20 years."

Let me direct the attention of the House to the result of using the two formulas here with the same description, first line and second line.

By using the formula to which my colleague has referred defining first-line cruisers as cruisers under 20 years of age, you lift eight cruisers that last year were regarded as second-line cruisers of Great Britain from the second-line list and put them into the first line of Great Britain's cruisers to-day.

Mr. FREAR. And the purpose of that comparison must have been to show additional or greater strength on the part of Great Britain as compared with the United States. Could there have been any other reason for that?

Mr. FRENCH. Of course I can not impugn anyone's motives. I assume that those who prepared the table felt that it gave a better picture. The members of our committee, however, in the hearings, felt it was not a table that ought to be used. We felt that the table might be misleading and that wrong deductions would be apt to be made. So we asked that "first line" and "second line" characteristics be omitted in the tables that we have presented. May I say further as to first line and second line characteristics that the phrases are not applied to the British Navy by the British Government. They are not terms used by Japan, France, or Italy. They are terms used in the United States alone.

We felt that we should not use formulas that would lift eight cruisers from the second line of Great Britain's cruisers of a year ago and put them into the first line of Great Britain's cruisers to-day.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If we do make a comparison of the second-line ships, then we have more.

Mr. FRENCH. They are older. I think it is a fair thing to put cruisers of all ages in the table and let the table speak for itself.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If we do that we are not so bad off.

Mr. FRENCH. Let me follow that thought a little further. By changing the formula nothing is added to the first-line cruisers of the strength of the United States. However, 43,130 tons—eight cruisers—are added to the first line of Great Britain's cruisers that a year ago were in the second line. In Japan's Navy four ships are added to her first line that last year in the table were regarded as second line, with a total tonnage of 18,550 tons.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Who did that?

Mr. FRENCH. I do not know who suggested the change of formulas, but I think it was unfortunate.

Mr. FREAR. It was introduced by the chairman of the Naval Committee, according to the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho has again expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five minutes more.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has raised a question of supreme importance.

Mr. FRENCH. It is.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is of vital importance in any candid discussion of this great question. I want to ask the gentleman from Idaho, in view of the criminations and recriminations on this subject in the newspapers, Does the gentleman think there has been any intentional or actual violation of the terms of the treaty?

Mr. FRENCH. I think not; no.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It has been intimated repeatedly, if not openly charged, that there has been repeated violations of the terms of the spirit of the treaty.

Mr. FRENCH. I think the members of the committee are a unit in the thought that the limitation of armaments treaty has been observed by all nations who were parties to it in letter and in spirit.

Mr. FREAR. That was because the treaty only provided for battleships of first class.

Mr. FRENCH. That is true. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] has asked why the change was made. We were told in committee that the Navy Department did not propose the change in formulas to which reference has been made, but that the new formula was based on a theoretical 20-year age limit for cruisers which advocates of the change believed represented a pretty close cross section of the age of cruisers in the opinion of the delegates to the Geneva conference that was held nearly two years ago.

Now let me follow up what the effect of changing the formulas has meant to the apparent cruiser strength of France and Italy. It has lifted three of the cruisers of France that a year ago were regarded as second-line cruisers, and placed them in the first line, although the guns have a caliber of only 5.9 inches in one instance, 3.9 inches in another, and 5.9 inches in another.

Turning to Italy, the effect of the change in formula is to raise six cruisers, last year placed in the second line, and place them in the first line this year.

Of those, several of them have light guns—one of 4.7 inches, another one of 3.9 caliber, and another one of 3.9 caliber, and several with a speed far less than 27 knots.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. The effect apparently is to raise the size of the French, the English, and the Italian Navies by including these obsolete or small cruisers of the second line.

Mr. FRENCH. That is apparently true. We do not stop, as a rule, to read the parenthetical parts of the headline and compare these parenthetical parts with like notations that were used in the tables of a year ago and with which Members had become familiar. Members seem to have assumed that "first line" and "second line" meant precisely what these phrases meant last year and they have been disturbed on account of what seemed to be unusual increases of cruiser strength of foreign navies within a year.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And who formulated the formula?

Mr. FRENCH. I do not know. I would say to the gentleman that in our hearings we recognized that the proposed formula, no matter upon what theory it might rest, would be apt to result in confusion and misunderstanding, and apparently from the discussion this afternoon such has been the case. I am glad that our committee recognized the possibilities and that we cut out the formula and asked that the list of the cruisers of the different nations be given to our committee, as you will find them in the hearings, without regard to first and second line, showing their ages and other pertinent facts from which deductions fair to all could be made.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman another question in which I believe we are all interested, because it is only an initial step taken by another of the great nations. It has built a cruiser, I understand, of something like 7,500 tons, with armament of several 11-inch guns.

I do not know how many of them there are. Is that likely to be the basis of a program for this country and for Great Britain and for Japan, or is it to be confined alone to Germany, or what is the thought, so far as the gentleman knows?

Mr. FRENCH. Under the terms of the limitation of armament treaty it would be impossible for any one of the powers, parties to the treaty, to build such a cruiser, armed with such guns.

Mr. FREAR. What will be the effect of building ships like this cruiser?

Mr. FRENCH. Of course, if any nation were to proceed in that course to any great extent it would mean that the other nations would necessarily have their attention focused upon that particular question as one of the questions to be considered at the time that the conference shall be called together again in about two years.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What nation is that?

Mr. FREAR. Germany.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. She has one cruiser and that is her whole navy.

Mr. FREAR. And the question in my mind is whether these other nations will follow in her footsteps.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. She has only one cruiser.

Mr. FREAR. I am sure we are not afraid of Germany.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH]. Does not the gentleman think that there has been a willful manipulation of tables and figures in order to stampede the completion of the big cruiser program at an early date?

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, I think I ought not to speculate on purposes or motives. We must assume honest intent even though we doubt the judgment of others. We have tried to be fair in assembling the data that we have assembled in our hearings, and I think you will be absolutely satisfied that the tables that we have presented in our hearings are absolutely fair tables and that they present an honest picture.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Chairman, under the terms of the disarmament treaty France and Italy may build under their battleship tonnage vessels of just the particular class to which the gentleman has referred. It has been a question in the parliaments of those countries as to just what particular type and vessels of that character they should build rather than building to the limit of the tonnage of battleships. The limitation of German building is not by virtue of the limitation of armaments treaty, but by reason of the Versailles treaty, wherein Germany is limited to a maximum tonnage of 10,000 tons for their armored vessels. It was under that that they have built this vessel which has been referred to.

Mr. FREAR. And I might inquire of the other two countries that you mentioned.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. They may build vessels of identical character if they have the knowledge and capacity to build them.

Mr. FRENCH. So far as the Versailles treaty is concerned, I think the gentleman is correct; but I think that so far as France and Italy are concerned and Great Britain, they have modified whatever rights they may have had under the Versailles treaty by the limitation of arms treaty.

Mr. ADKINS. Does the gentleman believe that our country and England and Japan are, so far as possible, maintaining their navies up to what the treaty provides for?

Mr. FRENCH. As to the types of ships, where we were bound as to numbers and tonnage; that is, capital ships, we are. As to airplane carriers, we have not built up to our strength, and neither has Great Britain nor Japan, but those two countries are nearer to that tonnage of 135,000 total tons than we are.

Mr. ADKINS. They are only behind in airplane carriers?

Mr. FRENCH. In airplane carriers. The number of cruisers was not limited. We did limit cruisers as to tonnage of each cruiser, and as to the size of guns but not as to numbers.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. WINTER].

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we have been tossing about, as it were, upon the waves of this discussion in respect to the Navy and the naval bill. I am sure we all appreciate the very clear and able statement made by the chairman of the committee. What I have to present here in just a moment or two will arouse no controversy, but on the contrary, I know, will have universal approbation. On last Saturday we had the pleasure and honor of having present in the galleries Captain Fried of the America. You will all recall that the rescue of the Florida was on the third anniversary, as I remember it, of the rescue of the freighter Antinoe by the Roosevelt, with Captain Fried in command of the Roosevelt on that occasion.

At that time an able and prominent citizen of my State wrote a very brief but splendid tribute dedicated to the heroes of the Roosevelt. The sentiment is applicable to both of those heroic rescues. I am sure you will enjoy it:

THE RESCUE

(Dedicated to the heroes of the Roosevelt by P. T. Coolidge, Lander, Wyo.)

Late, the steamship, Roosevelt,
Cleaving through an ocean belt
That was buckling in the grasp
Of the storm king's cruel clasp,
Caught the fateful S O S
"Boat disabled—in distress";
Caught the wireless call afar
Like a voice from hidden star
Through the boom of angry sea,
"Sinking—freighter—Antinoe."

Oh, that search for wounded mate,
Stern, heroic, desolate!
How that fearless ship held fast
In the tooth of icy blast
While the waters roared and churned!
Not one star in heaven burned.
In that raging, seething hell
Cracked each lifeboat like a shell.
Thrice a sunless day sank down,
Work of rescue all undone.

When the breaker's inky hue
Melted into ocean's blue
And a sun-burst kissed the sky,
That brave ship was standing by!
And the souls of sunken wreck
Swarmed upon her bruised deck.
Four horizons flash their foam,
Tattered sail doth sing of home;
Whilst below two heroes sleep
In the bosom of the deep.

Call the mountains to the sea,
We adore the bravery
That doth seem to gird the wave
When the mighty tempests rave,
Wherefore bow our heads to thee.
Saith the Banner of the Star,
Braver men ne'er went to war.
'Tis a part of God's decree
Dauntless men are stationed where Stricken lives so oft need care.

The author of these splendid verses is a citizen of my State, a resident of Lander, Wyo., a lawyer, Porter T. Coolidge. I am sure you will all appreciate with me this fine expression of sentiment from the people of the mountains to "those who go down to the sea in ships." [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, the matter I have to discuss is not one which is pleasant to talk about, but one which should be cleared up in the RECORD. On January 23 the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY], addressing the House, said:

> We have, and the testimony will corroborate my statements, subdivisions in the District of Columbia with 35,000 or 40,000 people living in thickly populated and congested centers without a sewer or a water pipe, and where the outside toilets, or privy closets as they call them, are increasing year by year. There is no justification for a condition of that kind in the Capital City of the great United States, and, further, let me say that these insanitary privy closets which I am talking about, in many instances, because of the seepage from them, have destroyed the only source of water in those neighborhoods, viz, the wells that are located there. Further than that, you should know we appropriate approximately $25,000 a year to empty these privy closets of night soil, as it is termed in the bill, and what is done with this night soil? Is it dumped into the river? Is it cremated, as it ought to be in sewerage disposal plant or crematory or in any other sanitary way? No; it is not. It is sold to the truck farmers adjacent to the city of Washington and used as fertilizer to grow vegetables which are sold to the people of the District of Columbia. Is it not about time that Congress undertook to put a stop to this insanitary and unjustifiable condition?

Just in order that the RECORD may contain the statement of fact, I ask unanimous consent to insert in full in the RECORD a letter from the acting health officer of the District of Columbia and a letter from the supervisor of city refuse in answer to the proposition which the gentleman made in that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letters are as follows:

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
OFFICE OF THE HEALTH DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 24, 1929.

Hon. ROBERT G. SIMMONS,
Chairman Subcommittee of the District House Committee on Appropriations.

DEAR SIR: I have asked the chief of the sanitary division of the District of Columbia Health Department to furnish me a report relative to the box-privy situation within the District as a whole, and particularly as pertains to the outlying districts, and I am furnishing his report verbatim, which is hereby attached.

I am forwarding this report to you for your information.

Very sincerely,

EDWARD J. SCHWARTZ, M. D.,
Acting Health Officer.

JANUARY 24, 1929.

To the ACTING HEALTH OFFICER:

I have to submit a conservative approximation of the box-privy situation as it exists in the District of Columbia to-day.

There are, approximately, 3,178 box privies in the District of Columbia, located as follows, viz: In that portion of the District of Columbia east of the Anacostia and Potomac Rivers there are, approximately, 2,603 privies serving an estimated population of 30,000 persons.

In Buzzards Point proper there are, approximately, 25 privies serving an estimated population of 125 persons.

In the outlying sections of the remainder of the District of Columbia there are, approximately, 550 box privies, with an estimated community population of 75,000 persons.

In the first-mentioned area, with a population of 30,000, allowing 5 persons to a household there would approximately be 6,000 families. This indicates that 2,603 of these households are served by box privies, and the remainder, 3,397 households, are provided with sewer facilities.

In the second area, with the same averaged number of households, 25 are served by box privies.

In the third area, with an estimated population of 75,000, the 550 box privies serve the same number of households with an approximate aggregate of 2,750 people.

The estimated population of the District of Columbia is 550,000, and from the averages given above the 3,178 privies serve the same number of households with an approximate aggregate of 15,890 people. In other words, 15,890 persons of the 550,000 estimated in the District of Columbia are at present being served by box privies.

In all cases where the engineer department certifies to the health department that the public sewer and water main have been extended to serve various premises prompt action is taken in giving notice to the owner of said property to connect their premises with the public sewer and water main within the time allowed by law. In all of these cases the notices are strictly enforced, except in cases where there are extenuating circumstances which justify the health department in granting reasonable extension of time in which to complete the work.

Regular and systematic inspections are made of premises on which there are maintained box privies, and in all cases where the privy is not constructed and maintained according to law the owners thereof are notified to correct the condition. The health department is without knowledge of privy boxes which are in a condition to cause seepage therefrom, and the records of the department fail to show that in the analyses of water from wells located on premises which are provided with a box privy that any source of contamination has been occasioned by seepage from box privies. The law governing the location of box privies prohibits them from being maintained within 50 feet of a well.

For several years past it apparently has been the ambition of a number of people to build homes in the remote parts of the District of Columbia, hence in the absence of water and sewer facilities it became necessary to provide privy accommodation. This number, however, does not equal the annual number of box privies abandoned.

J. FRANK BUTTS,
Chief Sanitary Inspector.

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
ENGINEER DEPARTMENT,
January 24, 1929.

To the AUDITOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA:

In response to your message that Mr. SIMMONS, chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations, wishes a report on the statement of Mr. CASEY, a member of the subcommittee, referring to night soil, that, "* * * It is sold to the truck farmers adjacent to the city of Washington and used as fertilizer to grow vegetables which are sold to the people of the District of Columbia * * *," I beg to advise that Mr. CASEY has been misinformed.

The District has a contract with Mr. Warner Stutler to collect this night soil and to empty it into the sewer at a disposal station built for this purpose on the Cool Spring Road by the contractor. This is the manner of disposal now in effect and the material is not and may not be disposed of in any other way.

MORRIS HACKER,
Supervisor City Refuse.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOGG].

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Chairman, every year in the United States 24,000 employees are killed and two and a half million employees injured in industrial accidents. The annual loss in working days is 227,000,000, and in wages $1,022,000,000. The pain, suffering, and distress caused by these accidents can not be expressed in words or measured in terms of value.

During the 19 months that America was engaged in the World War there were in the American forces 77,118 deaths, or a daily average of 150. In industry the daily average is 80 deaths.

The iron and steel industry cost 200 lives each year and permanently injure eleven hundred employees. Four hundred are killed annually in metal mines.

Steam railroads kill fifteen hundred employees each year and injure an additional 150,000 employees.

In the trades alone the Department of Labor finds that more than 10,000 fatal accidents occur each year, and that nonfatal accidents exceed one and a half million.

There is no national safety code for the construction industry. This must be met by State and city governments. Yet there would be a great advantage by having the laws uniform, so far as possible.

Workmen compensation laws have stimulated employers to the realization that the prevention of accidents is cheaper than the payment of benefits. Workmen compensation legislation has for the first time placed a definite monetary value upon the more common injuries suffered by workmen. Employers in recent years recognize their responsibility and, with the employees, deserve great credit for the present effort to avoid accidents.

Prevention of accidents lies in two directions: 1. Education. 2. Creation of physical conditions and the adoption of methods which will make it less easy for accidents to happen. These include such things as safeguarding of machinery, better instruction, and better inspection.

Machines were first built and placed with regard only to their production capacity. The dreadful loss of life and limb made its first appeal to the moral sense and then to the economic viewpoint.

Many large industries, including most railroads, have organized accident-prevention work. As a rule, the departments and divisions within large organizations compete with each other to establish safety records.

To increase the amount of compensation to be paid in case of death will not only render greater justice to the employee, but will more forcibly point out to the employees the weakness of their accident-prevention system.

An adequate scale of compensation benefits is the prime requisite for the prevention of work injuries. Too many compensation laws are far from adequate. One State has a maximum weekly limit of $12 and a noncompensated waiting period of 10 days. Six States have no workmen's compensation law at all.

A monetary payment for an accident or a life lost in the service of an industrial plant is no true offset to the injury suffered or the misery entailed. No money can compensate for these sufferings. Accident prevention alone can do away with these sufferings.

It has been said by many who are qualified to judge that 90 per cent of these accidents can be avoided. Last year the Coast Guard rescued 3,983 persons from peril. The Bureau of Mines, the Bureau of Public Health Service, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Bureau of Labor Statistics are doing much to make human life safer in industry.

It is indicated from reports that for every fatality there are more than 100 nonfatal accidents.

When an employee is injured or killed it does not mean, as is commonly supposed, that something went wrong for the first time and that it will, perhaps, not occur again in the same manner. It does mean that a certain thing had gone wrong several prior times and at the time of the accident the human element was present. A ladder may slip several times before an injury occurs. An accident reveals the weak point in productive methods. Often too much is expected of human effort in relation to power-driven machinery and modern production tools. Foremen sometimes permit working space to become cluttered up with unnecessary material. Safety inspection may be faulty—or there may be no adequate inspection. Occupational diseases are exacting an increasing toll.

Unless statistics point out the exact cause of an accident they are of no value. Merely to know that 24,000 people are being killed each year in industry does not aid in decreasing the number. The exact cause in detail of each accident must be known and published.

The prime purpose of H. R. 6848, to create a division of safety in the Bureau of Labor Statistics, is to develop a more complete and efficient method of securing and analyzing facts of accidents and of occupational diseases in industry on a national basis; to disseminate this information and to encourage the adoption of such preventive measures as will reduce or eliminate industrial accidents and occupational diseases.

The division of safety thus created is authorized by the same bill to establish a safety museum in order to better show the approved method of avoiding accidents and dangerous working conditions.

Congress can do no better thing toward the improvement of working conditions surrounding the American employees than to take steps which will end the situation that every year takes the lives of 24,000 workmen and disables two and one-half million working men and women. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I probably shall not use all of that time.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, a few days ago a group of New England Congressmen called upon the Secretary of the Navy with reference to the work in the various navy yards throughout the length and breadth of our coast line, but more particularly emphasizing, as is natural, the needs and necessities of the Boston yard.

In order that we may have a record of some of the suggestions that were offered at that meeting, not in a spirit of criticism, but in an earnest effort to be helpful, if possible, I am addressing myself to that particular subject.

Under the prevailing system there is a wide fluctuation of employment in the yards and, due to continual reductions in the personnel, the situation in the Boston yard is daily getting more acute. The force is being reduced to a point where it offers an ominous threat to the existence of the yard.

Between December 22, 1928, and January 25, 1929, there were over 450 discharges at this yard, and on the 1st of February there were 300 more men discharged from the Boston yard. The labor turnover always hampers economical operation, and it seems that some policy should be adopted which would stabilize employment in the yards.

No one organization can expect to be comparable with a similar group in cost, time, production, and so forth, when work loads fluctuate periodically. So, if efficiency is to prevail, work loads must be more evenly distributed, and labor turnover reduced to an absolute minimum.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. Does the gentleman mind stating whether or not any reason was given for the discharge of the men from the navy yard within the last year?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Lack of work.

The Boston yard does not ask for special favors, but does require, so far as is possible, equal treatment. Other yards may be in much more favorable positions than the Boston yard in the matter of employment, but the organization in this yard has the leadership and talent to successfully undertake and complete almost any project which the department may wish to assign.

Do not think from that statement that I am making a plea for the construction of one of the proposed cruisers in the Boston yard. I did not have that in mind.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will.

Mr. DENISON. A day or two ago we had speeches from two of the gentleman's colleagues from Massachusetts discussing that question. They took exactly opposite views as to whether we ought to require these cruisers, or a part of them, to be built in our navy yards. I would like to know what my friend from Massachusetts thinks on that subject.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It would put me in a rather embarrassing position to take a stand for or against either one or the other of my colleagues.

A short time ago the yard was rated as a second-class yard. To-day, because of its accomplishments, it has the distinction of being a first-class yard.

It is not the intention to cast reflections on any other navy yard engaged in repair or modernization work, but from the standpoint of engineering performance and construction, the Boston yard equals, if it does not exceed, the accomplishments of other navy yards. In addition to its location, it does work, however, under a handicap of experiencing an abnormal annual fluctuation in the amount of work and the number of men employed.

I may say right here that this is most disturbing, not only to the employees of the yard but to those of us who live in its vicinity, where most of the employees live, for by some strange coincidence these discharges almost always occur just previous to election, and those of you who live near any Government activity know what that means to the Congressman. There is no work, there is no appropriation, and the employees facing unemployment naturally turn to the Congressman in an endeavor to save their jobs, and that is one of the things a Congressman can not do.

Another feature is that the machinery installed in this yard is not at all up to date. It should have been made so during the late war by spending some money at this location as was done in practically every other yard, most noticeably at the Norfolk Navy Yard.

Another reason for these dreadful fluctuations that occur so frequently, throwing a large number of men out of employment, is the policy of the Navy Department—I hope you will pay particular attention to this—that for three months or so of the winter maneuvers of the fleet every ship must be in line. This is either a fetich or tradition, rather than a modern, practical arrangement. I do not believe that the benefit thus obtained with no war in sight can possibly compensate for the disturbance caused at the navy yards, for this brings about, in part at least, the taking on of men for large amounts of work covering a short period of time, which might be distributed over a much longer period. It seems reasonable and practicable to fix a complement for each navy yard and to arrange for continuous work to keep the men employed. This can be done without seriously disturbing the work of the fleet.

One of the troubles is that the schedule of the fleet is made inflexible, so that ships needing repairs must come to the yards late in the fall and intensive efforts must be made to discharge them along about the first or middle of January, necessitating the employment of a large number of extra men, so that the ships may be finished in ample time to join the fleet in its maneuvers. This also disturbs the other work in the yard, because it requires a shifting of men from one job to another to accomplish these rush jobs. Of course, when the yard takes on extra men they get a poorer class of workers, and this group is quite likely, with the inevitable discharge near at hand, in some instances to lay down on the job. As I said before, this is not by any means economical, nor do I believe it necessary to the fleet itself, and it surely is a tremendous handicap to the yards.

I fear to offer an amendment to this appropriation bill, because, in all probability, if not declared out of order, it would so disturb the Budget as to bring about the defeat of the amendment. I would present, however, to the Naval Affairs Committee, to the subcommittee on naval appropriations, to the Bureau of the Budget, and to the Navy Department not only these general suggestions which might be helpful in all of the yards but in addition that the Boston Navy Yard be equipped with marine railways for handling small vessels, such as destroyers, Coast Guard vessels, and so forth. It is now necessary to empty one of the large docks at considerable expense when work is to be done on such type of craft, and I am reliably informed that there would be a saving of at least $180 to $200 a day on such jobs if the Boston yard were equipped with marine railways. The cost of equipment would not be great.

In closing, I wish to emphasize what I have so hurriedly presented: That the greatest efficiency and economy in the operation of all of the yards would be the stabilization of employment. Men who are not confronted with a lay off will undoubtedly give a greater degree of service than though they were mentally disturbed by the prospect of unemployment, which in itself very naturally tends to slow up physical performances. It would be much better for every one concerned to guarantee in effect the steady employment of 1,500 to 1,800 men in a yard than to have a period where 2,500 might be employed for some little time, and then have the force reduced almost at one fell swoop to 1,200. I am confident that if the Navy Department will make a thorough investigation of this situation, they can so arrange their repair work that it will be possible to keep a well-trained and efficient body of men constantly employed, and will in no wise hamper the fleet in its general operations. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER]. [Applause.]

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in the judicious appropriation of the public revenues the pending bill reflects good, sound business judgment in the affairs of the Government. It also reflects the rendition of valuable services to the House and to the country by the members of the Subcommittee on Appropriations preparing the bill. In its presentation by the distinguished gentleman from Idaho it reflects a grasp of detail and a mastery of the business connected with the department that immediately prompts the inquiry, Why not give the country the benefit of such excellent service in a larger field? Why not put business efficiency in the Navy Department? Why not eliminate experiment and jingoism and insure a successful administration? In other words, why should not the President elect appoint the gentleman from Idaho as the next Secretary of the Navy? [Applause.]

This brief expression of appreciation of service rendered would be incomplete if it did not include the valuable service rendered by the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES], who is also one of the very able members of this subcommittee. [Applause.] Service rendered is the reason why the gentleman from Kansas has been able to represent a strong Republican district for so many years. [Applause.] Out in Kansas, when they refer to the Hoover landslide, our Democratic friends always reply by referring to the AYRES landslide, which resulted in a very large majority in his reelection during the recent election. [Applause.]

It is with regret that I depart from these pleasant considerations to the sordid matters of administration. In a recent issue of one of the leading papers in the city appeared this criticism:

President Coolidge feels that the Interstate Commerce Commission is too slow. In his opinion, the commission members are able and the questions they settle are important, but he would like to see them dispose of those questions quicker. The Government itself, the Chief Executive believes, has had problems to contend with arising out of delayed action by the commission. As a case in point, the commission's ruling on payment rates for the carriage of mail by the railroads has been cited. This rate was fixed after three years of study, and the carriers were awarded $45,000,000 in back pay, dating to the time the controversy began. The President disapproves of paying such an award and has directed that the Post Office withhold the funds, planning to let the matter be passed upon by the Court of Claims. He feels that the present issue between the Government and the railroads would not have arisen if the commission had not taken so long in deciding the case.

The outspoken criticism of the Chief Executive of the Nation in reference to the administration of an agency of the Congress immediately challenges the consideration of the efficiency of the administration of that independent commission.

I believe it is the function of political parties always to be constructive and that any attempt at concealment or any attempt to condone that which is not efficient in the administration of the affairs of the people is a false policy and one that does not represent the interests of the people. [Applause.]

Adequate transportation facilities and service at a reasonable charge are essential to every industry and every section of country. It is not a partisan or sectional matter. It is purely economic and is nation-wide. It affects directly every constituent in every congressional district in the United States, and especially is the question of transportation vital and imperative of solution with the people of the Middle West and the Southwest and the intermountain sections of country, composing the great agricultural producing sections. Remote from water transportation, these sections comprise the territory designated by the rate experts as the high plateau of freight rates in the rate structure, where rates are fixed high enough to make good the losses in the out-of-pocket rates, the below-cost rates, the coast-to-coast rates, and the competitive water rates through the Panama Canal.

The people living in these sections of the country are not opposed to the railroads. They recognize that rail transportation is absolutely essential for their development and prosperity. Neither are they opposed to the reasonable return as provided by law upon a fair valuation of the properties held for and used in the service of transportation.

Their complaint is not against the roads, it is not against the reasonable return, but it is against the inefficiency of the administration of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the neglect of Congress to provide adequate machinery to administer the equitable distribution of the rates to every section of the country alike.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The gentleman has referred to the Middle West and the Intermountain States and the agricultural sections. I recall that for the last four or five years there has been discussion in Congress and throughout the Nation relative to the necessity of a readjustment of rates on agricultural commodities. Can the gentleman give us any information as to what, if anything, the Interstate Commerce Commission has done relative to that matter?

Mr. GARBER. In reference to the reorganization of the rate structure?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. As to agricultural products.

Mr. GARBER. Yes; I shall attempt to cover that phase of the question before I complete my presentation of the matter.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield further, or does the gentleman desire to yield?

Mr. GARBER. It is a pleasure to yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. As the gentleman says he is going to cover that proposition, I want to call his attention to a condition relative to freight rates and agricultural products out of the State of Oklahoma, which the gentleman and I represent in part in the Congress.

Mr. GARBER. I will be very glad, indeed, to hear the gentleman on that question.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The gentleman has probably discovered it; but if not, it may be of benefit in his discussion. Since 1921 the freight on wheat from Oklahoma points to Chicago, which is our primary market, has been raised 11½ cents a hundred pounds; on corn it has been raised 10½ cents a hundred pounds; on oats 10½ cents a hundred pounds; and on cotton, from Oklahoma to Lowell, Mass., it has been raised 47 cents a hundred pounds, with a comparative raise on all other agricultural products out of Oklahoma.

Now, for the information of the gentleman permit me to say I discovered in figuring these four commodities that upon moving the 1926 crop out of the State of Oklahoma it cost the farmers of Oklahoma $13,000,000 more to move their wheat, corn, oats, and cotton in 1926 that it would have cost them to have moved those four commodities before the raise in freight rates made as a result of the Esch-Cummins Railroad Act, and as this rate raise was comparative on all agricultural products, there is little doubt but that in the gentleman's State and mine the farmers are to-day paying from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 a year excess freight rates over what they previously paid; and does not the gentleman think that when Congress is in special session this year seeking to give us agricultural relief there would be no better avenue than to take up and reconstruct the agricultural rate structure?

Mr. GARBER. I thank the gentleman for his contribution of facts and figures in reference to the rates from the Southwest. Of course, they do not take into consideration, as I understood them, the increase in the price of labor and the cost of transportation, but there is not any question but that the gentleman's facts and figures show the necessity for a reorganization of the rate structure on farm products because of the horizontal increases made by the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1920.

Mr. MERRITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MERRITT. Does the gentleman feel that the mere statement of the figures which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD] gave indicates that all that $13,000,000 was borne by the farmers of Oklahoma or by the consumers?

Mr. GARBER. Well, I look at that question in this way: When a farmer sells his products the cost of transportation is deducted from the price, is it not?

Mr. MERRITT. That is the way the gentleman figures it; I do not know whether it is so or not.

Mr. GARBER. When the farmer of Oklahoma sells his wheat the high rates are deducted from the price that he receives for his product, and when he buys his implements, his clothing and that for his family—their necessities of life—his material, and equipment for the farm from the markets of the East, the rates are passed on and added to the price of everything he buys. The freight is deducted from everything he sells and it is added to everything he buys. In effect, therefore, like Jones, the farmer pays the freight both ways—it cuts him like a two-edged sword—and with the rates on agricultural products 52 per cent higher than they were before the war, they absorb the little profits that he would otherwise make.

Mr. MERRITT. Of course, the freight rates are eventually absorbed at both ends; is not that so?

Mr. GARBER. Yes; and the farmer is at both ends of the proposition. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRITT. No; I think not.

Mr. GARBER. He must pay the cost of transportation when he sells, and he must pay the cost of transportation when he purchases a manufactured article.

Mr. MERRITT. Is it the gentleman's view that if the freight rates were changed, so that the freight rates were lessened by this $16,000,000, the farmer would get all of it?

Mr. GARBER. No; I do not take that view; I do not believe the gentleman takes into consideration the increase of the cost of labor and the cost of transportation. I do believe that a reorganization of the rate structure would eliminate the horizontal increases and we would have a commodity rate that would reduce the charge against farm products.

Mr. MERRITT. If the $16,000,000 was taken off, in order to keep a fair return to the railroads, they would have to be put upon some other products, would they not?

Mr. GARBER. Possibly so. Any deficiency created would possibly have to be made good in other lines. But here is the position of the West on this question: Because of the horizontal increases made by the commission in 1920, ranging from 25 to 45 per cent, interterritorially 33⅓ per cent, the rate structure was dislocated and the burden rested more heavily on the heavy carload commodity lots and the long haul. Now, by eliminating the horizontal increases in the rate structure, I believe there would be an adjustment that would afford material relief to agriculture. Whatever the result may be, the farmers of this country are willing to pay their fair, reasonable share of the burden of transportation. [Applause.]

Mr. MERRITT. So the gentleman says that the maladjustment is due to error in the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. GARBER. Not that exactly; but to the arbitrary raise in freight rates.

Mr. MERRITT. And not to error?

Mr. GARBER. Well, possibly not to what one might strictly term error but, to say the very least, to a resort to a most drastic remedy, crushing in its effect on the prices to the farmers for their products.

Mr. MERRITT. The gentleman does not want to take the position of the defeated suitor cussing the court?

Mr. GARBER. In so far as the inefficiency in administration of the commission is concerned, I am willing to admit that the farmers of these sections to which I have referred are in the position of a defeated suitor and while they are not cussing the commission, they are, with the President, receiving its confession with the exclamation, "Oh, how long you have delayed!"

Mr. MERRITT. The gentleman's remedy is not the abolition of the commission?

Mr. GARBER. No; not abolition, but decentralization and additional machinery for administration.

Mr. McMILLAN. The gentleman thinks that it is not error on the part of the commission but rather the attitude on the part of the commission?

Mr. GARBER. Yes; it is the attitude of the commission as well as their resort to such desperate means to rehabilitate the roads. While the roads may have needed help—they undoubtedly did after just emerging from governmental operation—yet the remedy of horizontal increases was disastrous to agriculture. The commission was quick to save the roads, quick to impose horizontal increases for their benefit, but very, very, very slow, indeed, to remove those increases to relieve the farmers; and even at this late day, long after the emergency in transportation has passed, much of the horizontal increases still remain over the protest of all the farm conferences, the President and Congress, emphatically made four, five, and six years ago.

Replying more particulary to the suggestion of the gentleman from South Carolina, my criticism includes the attitude of the commission, its attitude of leisurely indifference in contemplation of the condition of agriculture during the last eight years and its refusal to assume the initiative, after being commanded by the Executive and Congress, in organized, systematic effort to relieve the situation. Its refusal to act for the relief of agriculture after six or seven years of demand, to say the very least, requires some explanation for the public to understand. Of course, it will say that it has been overloaded with other duties. There is no question but that it has been busily engaged; but right there we say that it should not have permitted its attention to be diverted from the imperative needs of the people and from rendering service in the more important field of its administration.

Mr. MERRITT. I understand the gentleman then to say that they have been so overloaded that they have not had time to change it?

Mr. GARBER. There is not any question but that the commission has been overloaded, and this is where Congress comes in for just criticism in overloading the commission without supplying additional adequate machinery for administration. But rate revision should have been a preferred number on its program and it should not have permitted any additional duties to interfere with that work.

Mr. MERRITT. I think the commission has been overloaded.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, as a background for the citation of figures of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD], I cite the Southwest cases. In Consolidated Southwestern cases, decided April 5, 1927, the Interstate Commerce Commission found the classification rates between points in the Southwest and Kansas-Missouri territory to be in a general chaotic condition, complicated and unsatisfactory, with undue prejudice against different points.

Quoting, the commission said:

> The record discloses mutual competition under inequitable rate conditions between points in Oklahoma, Arkansas, western Louisiana, Texas, Kansas, and southern Missouri. In other words, the opportunity to do business is sometimes foreclosed by freight rates. That communities, as well as individuals or industries, may be adversely affected by rate maladministration is clearly illustrated by the testimony in this case.

A TYPICAL EXAMPLE

Take Miami, Okla., as a typical example. It is 13 miles from Baxter Springs, Kans. The spread in first-class rates from St. Louis is 32.5 cents. Between the other class rates the spreads are correspondingly disproportionate. A dealer in Miami received from Detroit 572 Ford automobiles during 1922. The freight charges amounted to $55.07 per automobile. On a similar shipment to Baxter Springs, Kans., the charge would be $51.55 per automobile. To meet that competition the dealer suffered a pecuniary loss of $2,207.80 a year. Merchants at Miami are unable to compete with merchants in Baxter Springs, where the freight is a material factor. In their struggle for commercial existence, many of the people of Miami are moving to Baxter Springs.

In picking a location for a jobbing house or factory one of the first things to be considered is the freight-rate situation. There is keen rivalry between towns in the Southwest for the location of new industries to meet the increased need of the growing population. There is thus an endless chain of actual and potential competition in the distribution of goods or class rates not only within the territory but from and to the border States and cities beyond. Towns paying for like service higher rates than others or paying rates higher, distance considered, than others are placed at a disadvantage and often are deprived of their natural advantage of location.

In its investigation the commission found undue preferentials and discriminations in rates on farm products in the same rate-making district.

A COMPARISON OF WESTERN GRAIN RATES

The following is a memorandum showing a comparison of western grain rates in the same rate-making district. In comparison with the rates of other States in the district it will show vicious discrimination against the farm products of Oklahoma and Texas.

Miles	Minnesota scale	Kansas scale	Oklahoma-Texas scale	Carriers' proposed scale
50	8	10	11	15
100	12	13	15	19
200	14	17½	20	26½
300	16	20	26	34
400	17½	20½	29	39
500	19½		33	44

It will thus be seen that the Oklahoma-Texas scale on a 300-mile haul is 30 per cent higher than the Kansas scale and 62½ per cent higher than the Minnesota scale; on the 400-mile haul the discrimination is nearly 41 per cent in favor of Kansas points and nearly 66 per cent for Minnesota points. The discrimination is shown to be existent all along the line, the Kansas grain rates being from 20 to 30 per cent lower on shipments to Kansas City than are Oklahoma grain rates, generally, to the same point, and Minnesota grain rates to Minneapolis are still lower than are the Kansas rates. If we could secure the Minnesota scale on shipments from Oklahoma to the Gulf, it would mean a reduction of approximately 60 per cent in our wheat rates.

ILLUSTRATING THE DELAY IN RATE RELIEF

The proceedings in the cases cited were instituted in 1923 and finally submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission on June 19, 1925, and by it decided on April 5, 1927. Because of suspension orders the decision will not become effective until May, 1928, and not then if further deferred.

The freight conditions described by the commission have existed in that southwestern country for years. The rates were fixed by the roads under private regulation and have exacted millions and millions of dollars annually from the people of Oklahoma and other Southwestern States in excess of a reasonable compensatory return. The rates have never been revised or readjusted, although there has been a constant and incessant demand for such relief.

How long is the country going to stand this interminable delay in such proceedings? If it has taken the commission five years to revise and readjust rates in the classified service in the Southwest, how long is it going to take it to revise and readjust rates of all classes throughout the entire country?

The commission has been engaged in the performance of too many other duties imposed upon it by the Congress. It is attempting to administer under 28 different acts of Congress. From time to time it cheerfully accepts enlarged jurisdiction and additional responsibilities and then in their exercise and performance is compelled to redelegate its power. Such redelegation for the performance of the duties purely ministerial in their character is, of course, necessary and expected, but the redelegation of power for the performance of legislative duties is a dangerous procedure and unnecessarily jeopardizes the public interest.

The power to initiate rates for revision and readjustment is the commission's greatest responsibility. There is no other power the commission can exercise which would result in greater benefit direct to all the people. In his December message in 1923 President Coolidge, recognizing this fact, insisted upon the entire reorganization of the rate structure for freight for the relief of agriculture. The commission undoubtedly read the message. Since that time every farm organization in the country and many representative civic organizations, including the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and all of its submembers, urged a revision and readjustment of rates for the relief of agriculture. The commission knows this. It knows that the horizontal increases should not be permitted to stand 24 hours. It knows that the President, the Congress, and the country have been expecting revision and readjustment, and yet during these five years of coma for agriculture what has it done?

The very fact that after five years the commission has been unable to effect substantial results in revision and readjustment for agriculture, when every other line of industry has been abounding with prosperity, ought to convince the most skeptical of the inadequacy of our present machinery to administer our regulatory power in rate making satisfactorily to the people.

We have overloaded our machinery of administration. The magnitude of the responsibilities and the multitude of the enormous tasks imposed upon the commission are not adequately appreciated.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I do not want to interfere with the gentleman too much, but I think the gentleman has rendered a distinct service to the people of the Southwest in this discussion.

I call his attention to another situation under which we are suffering out there, and that is this: That under the present schedule if you ship a hundred pounds of freight from New York to St. Louis, Mo., a distance of 1,141 miles, you do it at $1.65 per hundred pounds; but if you put that same hundred pounds of freight on a train at St. Louis and ship it to Benito, Okla., in my district, a distance of 341 miles, the rate is $1.55 per hundred pounds, or only a difference of 10 cents per hundred pounds in favor of the 341 miles distance as against the 1,141-mile distance from New York to St. Louis, and we have suffered under that condition during the last four to six years, without any opportunity of getting relief.

Mr. GARBER. Yes; the raise in rates to which the gentleman refers is designated by the rate experts as the "barrier at the Mississippi River." It is almost impossible to conceive that such an obstruction to commerce would be permitted overnight.

The barrier at the Mississippi River is the immediate jump in freight rates. That is what it is. I did not intend to deviate from this discussion into a discussion of rates, but since the gentleman from Oklahoma has called attention to the rates, in corroboration of his contribution, I want to cite these figures. Steel is taken as a typical example of all of the other commodities. The rate on steel for every 300 miles east of the Mississippi River is 47.5 cents per hundred pounds. For each 300 miles west of the river the rate is 83.5 cents per hundred pounds. The rate west is more than 75 per cent per hundred pounds higher than the rate east. This is the barrier that prohibits the West from shipping in iron and steel from the East. We want to be your customers.

The vast empire west of the Mississippi River is the meat and bread basket of the East. It produces the foodstuffs to feed the industrial workers as well as those of all other occupations and professions. It is the best market the East has for its manufactured products. Its consuming capacity and its capacity to pay are larger than that of any other market in the world, and likewise the East is the best market for the agricultural products of the West. It has the largest consuming capacity and capacity to pay of any market for farm products in the world.

These markets are joining each other—depending one upon the other—and there is every economic reason why there should be the closest cooperation in removing from the channels of commerce every unnecessary burden.

The country west of the Mississippi River has approached the industrial stage in its development. When it needs building material for its roads and bridges and cities in the creation of its markets at home, and when it proceeds, as it is about to proceed, in this new epoch of industrial development, to curtail its long haul and cut its freight bill in two and to create a market at home, it finds an insurmountable barrier at the Mississippi River on the east and the Panama Canal on the west.

Freight is divided generally into numerous classes, each with its own rate, and there are other special commodity rates. We only refer to the five main classes. Class 1 includes dry goods, shoes, and high-class merchandise; class 2 includes hardware, cutlery, tools; class 3 includes high-class groceries, furniture, and so forth; class 4 includes the general run of heavier groceries, such as salt; and class 5 includes carload lots of steel, and so forth. Here [indicating] are the rates per 100 pounds from New York to Kansas City through St. Louis on the various classes. Bear in mind that the distance from New York to St. Louis is 1,050 miles and from St. Louis to Kansas City is 300 miles.

	New York to St. Louis	St. Louis to Kansas City
Class 1	$1.66	$0.83½
Class 2	1.45½	.63½
Class 3	1.10½	.52½
Class 4	.77	.38
Class 5	.66	.30½

COMPARE THESE RATES

Consider the vicious discrimination against the West on all the goods that we have to buy of you people in the East!

The part of the through rate that is charged from St. Louis to Kansas City ought to be only about one-third of the rate from New York to St. Louis, when actually it is nearly three-fourths.

On dry goods, shoes, and high-class merchandise it is 69 per cent greater. On hardware, cutlery, tools, and so forth, it is 80 per cent greater. On high-class groceries, furniture, and so forth, it is 73 per cent greater.

On the general run of heavier groceries, such as salt, it is 71 per cent greater.

On the carload classes, of which steel is a typical example, it is 75 per cent greater.

The jump in the rate level at the Mississippi River in each case is so great as to prevent the industrial development of the country west of the Mississippi River and to exact from farm prices the profit that would permit the farmers to enjoy a degree of prosperity.

In the seventies or eighties, when the country was sparsely settled, there might have been some reason and justification for the erection of such a barrier, but since no reason exists to-day there is no valid claim made anywhere for its continuance, and yet it still remains—the rate level has not been readjusted.

We have had seven years of rate making, with full power to the commission to revise and readjust rates, but the barrier has not been removed. The West says:

Take down the barrier, remove the unnecessary burdens upon commerce, and let it flow as freely as possible between the several States.

THE BARRIER ON THE WEST

Take the barrier on the West—the Panama Canal—the through rates are so low to the coast and the interior rates so high as to erect another barrier on the West which casts a heavy burden upon the interior.

COMPARISON OF INTERIOR AND COAST RATES

The rate on dry goods from Chicago to Enid, Okla., a distance of 832 miles, is $2.275 per hundred. The rate on dry goods from Chicago to San Francisco, a distance of 1,429 miles farther, is $1.58 per hundred. Thus we see that the rate from Chicago to Enid, Okla., is 53 per cent greater than the rate from Chicago to San Francisco, although the distance of the latter is 1,429 miles farther from Chicago than is Enid.

Stated in another way, the hauling of a 30-ton car of dry goods from Chicago to San Francisco, San Francisco being 1,429 miles farther from Chicago than is Enid, Okla., costs $41.70 less than hauling the same tonnage from Chicago to Enid.

Take the rate on steel. From Chicago, a distance of 2,300 miles from San Francisco, for domestic consumption it is $1 per hundred. For export it is $0.40 per hundred. These rates apply on the same commodities between the same points, subject to the same minimum pound weight and the same rule of law which requires earnings in excess of cost.

A 40-cent rate on steel for 2,300 miles when exported to China or any other foreign country and the rate of $1 per hundred when used in construction at home obviously means that one of two things is true—the 40-cent rate covers all the cost and some profit for the 2,300-mile haul to the coast or it is an illegal rate maintained in defiance of law, and that is a burden upon commerce which the consumers of freight should not be required to pay.

When recently interrogated in reference to these rates to the coast, Commissioner Esch blandly explained that they were rates put into effect by the railroads and the commission had never been called upon to determine their validity.

The continuation of such undue preferentials raises the question whether or not the American farmer in the West is not entitled to as much consideration as the Chinaman in the Far East.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Is it not true also that these people in the industrial centers are our best customers?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. So that we can not prosper on the farms unless these people are employed at good wages and steady employment?

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman is right. We think that our relationship is such that there should be reciprocity between the two sections of the country, one so dependent upon the other.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, who is a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. GARBER. I ask the gentleman to grant me 15 minutes.

Mr. AYRES. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes, so that that will make 15 minutes.

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman referred to the southwestern rate case, and the length of time it has taken the commission to determine it; also to the high agricultural rates. The gentleman will recall that the Hoch-Smith resolution was passed something like three years ago.

Mr. GARBER. Four years ago.

Mr. NEWTON. And the committee since that time has been conducting an investigation into the entire agricultural rate situation?

Mr. GARBER. To the best of its ability.

Mr. NEWTON. It was my privilege last fall to be home when those hearings were held in Minneapolis. They were there for several weeks. Commissioner Meyer was in charge, and there were several examiners there. I was told a month or two later, when the final arguments were submitted, that the testimony given in that case would cover 50,000 pages, and that the testimony and the exhibits alone would fill a room about 16 feet square. I only mention that to show something of the magnitude of the task of attempting at any one time any rearrangement of the rate structure, because there are so many divergent elements entering into it, necessitating the consumption of a tremendous amount of time upon the part of the commission.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman from Minnesota is correct in his statement of fact. Through its examiners largely, with a commissioner now and then, it is holding hearings throughout the country and has taken much testimony in reference to rate conditions. But the continuous taking of testimony will not relieve the situation unless it is used as a basis for action with a reasonable degree of promptness.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. I want to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma if he has ever discussed this matter with any members of the commission so he can tell the House the reason given for this difference. I would like to know why they make that difference in such things.

Mr. GARBER. I can only give the gentleman from Illinois my views in regard to the matter. No member of the committee or of the commission has ever afforded the committee any explanation. As I understand it, the rates were imposed when the railroads built across the country when it was new and in the developing state. At that time the traffic from the West to the East was light, necessitating the hauling of empty cars on their return, so that it required high rates to pay the cost then. Those rates went into the rate structure under private regulation and control and have never been removed, and so it is with the rate structure throughout the entire country. It is literally filled with rates imposed in the old competitive days and the pioneer days.

Conditions since then having changed to such a marked degree, the West, having become more fully developed and thickly populated and more productive, now affords loaded cars going to the East to such an extent that at times there is a great scarcity of cars. The heavy hauls are from the West to the East now, when formerly they were from the East to the West. Hence the necessity for the reorganization of the rate structure to meet the changed conditions.

Mr. DENISON. As I understand it, this difference in the amount of the rate East and West is a sample of the survival of a condition which existed at a time when it might have been justified.

Mr. GARBER. That is true.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I will.

Mr. ARENTZ. The same condition prevailed a few years ago in the shipping of a carload of freight to Salt Lake City or Reno. You had to pay the rate to San Francisco and back to Salt Lake City or Reno. Now, the condition of private control disappeared many years ago, but because of the idea of holding things forever, the railroads are prone to fight to the very last ditch in these matters and retain them in their rate structure to-day.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman from Nevada is referring to the vicious discriminations in rates under private control, but there is no excuse for such rates now, with the commission clothed with initiatory power to prescribe just and reasonable rates on its own motion.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I will.

Mr. AYRES. The gentleman from Oklahoma started to say, or did say, it was on account of the Interstate Commerce Commission not having adequate machinery that this was being delayed and the Congress should do something to give them the machinery.

Mr. GARBER. That is correct.

Mr. AYRES. I hope the gentleman will state to the committee before he gets through what he thinks Congress should do in the way of giving the Interstate Commerce Commission adequate machinery. My understanding is from the commission itself that it does not need any additional members on the commission, either commissioners or examiners, and I am anxious to know what Congress can do to give them the machinery in order to enable them to keep up with its work and stop further delay.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman from Kansas has indeed made a very material inquiry in the consideration of this subject, and if the gentleman will just assure me the time necessary I will give him an answer; I will give him my answer, at least to that question. But I have some other matters that I want to present before I arrive at that.

Mr. AYRES. I will give the gentleman time.

Mr. GARBER. I thank the gentleman for his liberality.

Now, in the consideration of this question, the members of this committee understand as well as the country that when we assumed the responsibility of the regulation of the control of the roads and the fixing of their reasonable return and the rates to create that return we thereby eliminated the roads from any responsibility in the administration of an equitable apportionment of the burdens upon commerce and undertook the administration of that question ourselves, did we not? We did. So that in this controversy, looming large in the dissatisfaction and resentment of those sections remote from water transportation, the railroads are not responsible; it is the Congress and the commission, charged with the responsibility of administration, that are responsible for the present condition.

Now the commission realizes its inefficiency. In its last annual report it said in substance that the rapid growth in the variety and volume of work imposed upon it made the discharge of its duties less and less current. In corroboration of that general confession, permit me to read the testimony of one of the ablest members of the commission, Mr. J. R. Eastman, a man who, in my judgment, has rendered lasting and invaluable service to this country as a member of that commission. Corroborating the statement of the commission in its last annual report, and corroborating the criticism of President Coolidge and the criticism that exists generally throughout the country, in his testimony, given before the Subcommittee on Appropriations recently, Commissioner Eastman said:

In the first place, the commission is subject to a great deal of criticism from time to time. Some of it is just and some of it is unjust. But we have recognized that there has been one very just criticism of the commission's work, and that is that we were not keeping up with our rate cases; that we were falling behind in the decision of those cases; and also that we were taking too long a time to decide them. That criticism has been pressed on us by the shippers, especially through the shippers' organization, the National Industrial Traffic League. It has been brought home to us by the railroads and from time to time Members of Congress have brought that matter to our attention. It is a just criticism.

He says, "It is a just criticism." That is what I started out to say in the presentation of this case, to say we ought to confess our inefficiency wherever it exists and should attempt to afford some constructive remedy and relief for the conditions existing; and that is the true function of a political party or a Member of this responsible legislative body.

Mr. Eastman further says:

The reason for the situation which gives rise to that criticism has been the increasing volume of the rate work and an insufficient force to handle it.

Now, then, it ought to be said in defense of the commission that in addition to the natural increase and growth of the commerce of the country, the recent acts of Congress have imposed upon it a vast volume of work. You take the transportation act of 1920. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] is perhaps as familiar with that as any other member of this committee. That act imposed upon the commission the execution of an entirely new policy. An emergency existed in transportation. The physical properties of the roads had to be rehabilitated, and Congress enacted that measure which imposed upon the commission the execution of problems, intricate and complex, which, in my judgment, have no parallel or precedent in the administration of economic laws. The act overloaded the commission with its long-time program as to the completion of valuations and the bringing of those valuations down to date, the unification of the roads looking forward to their consolidation into a convenient number of systems, the auditing of the accounts of all of these roads, and so on.

It is almost impossible for mental grasp to take into consideration the vast volume of the work involved, not to speak of the policing of the accounts of the roads in order to enforce the recapture clause and the division of joint rates in the public interest. Those and many other duties were imposed on the commission by this act, and as a result the commission permitted its attention to be diverted from the more important field of service of the people in adjusting the freight rates of the country to this vast volume of work which was forced upon it by the transportation act. As a consequence it has been unable to administer efficiently in the distribution of charges upon commerce. There is an ever-increasing number of rate cases remaining unadjusted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. GARBER. I ask unanimous consent for additional time in which to answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES. In order to do that I would have to yield more time than I have at my disposal.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have listened with great interest to the gentleman's discussion of this question. The gentleman has pointed out how the Interstate Commerce Commission has been loaded with work, so that it can not deal with matters of unfair rates to those of us in the Central West. I want to call the gentleman's attention to a matter he brought out in a hearing before the committee of which he and I are members, when Commissioner Esch was before the committee. In response to an inquiry by the gentleman he stated that steel and iron for export receive a differential rate of 60 cents a hundred as against the same article for consumption at home; in other words, if steel and iron are sold for export, they are charged 60 cents a hundred less than when the same are used at home. Then the gentleman asked what rate was allowed on wheat for export, and he answered 6 cents a hundred; in other words, the present rate allows steel and iron for export a reduction of ten times the amount of reduction it allows to the farmer upon his wheat. Then the gentleman asked the commissioner how long that had been in existence, and he stated it was there when he came upon the commission. Then the gentleman pointed out to him that they had the power now under the law to make a change if a change were needed, and you said to him, "Having that information, what excuse have you to give for the commission that they do not change that unfair discrimination between wheat and steel and iron." The gentleman gave them the information and the law gives them the power, and yet they do not act.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman has certainly pointed out one of the great discriminatory rates against agricultural products and I thank the gentleman for doing that. Let us hear some member of this committee excuse it. The rate on steel per 100 pounds from Chicago to San Francisco for domestic consumption is $1, while the rate on steel from Chicago to San Francisco for export is 40 cents per 100, or a preferential of 60 per cent for exports on steel.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. While on wheat it is 6 cents per 100, according to the statement made by Commissioner Esch.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. Wheat does not move from Chicago to the Pacific coast. That is not the normal movement of wheat. If a comparison is to be made, it should be made the way in which wheat does move.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman from Minnesota will admit that it is the natural movement of steel for export to China, for instance?

Mr. NEWTON. Certainly.

Mr. GARBER. While the natural movement of wheat for export, in the Southwest, in Oklahoma and Kansas, is to Galveston?

Mr. NEWTON. But not from Chicago.

Mr. GARBER. Oh, no.

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman is quite right about the movement of steel from Chicago to the Pacific coast, but wheat from Chicago would not move that way. It might move down the Mississippi River by the barge line and out that way, or it might move across the Lakes to Montreal and New York and from there to the ports of the world.

Mr. GARBER. That is correct.

Mr. NEWTON. The difference is between the route on steel, where the product moves, and a paper route on wheat, where no wheat does move.

Mr. GARBER. That is an export rate on steel; is it not?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. In its natural channel of trade; is it not?

Mr. NEWTON. That is so.

Mr. GARBER. Then why not give to the farmers of this country an export rate on cotton in the natural channel of trade and an export rate on wheat in the natural channel of trade? [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON. There is a difference in the domestic rate on wheat and the export rate.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman state to the committee how much it is?

Mr. NEWTON. I do not know what it is. I did not know the gentleman was going to speak on this subject or that this point was to be brought out. But the fact is that there is no discrimination in selecting steel and having a particular rate on steel and having no corresponding reduction on agricultural products, for there are lower export rates on agricultural products. These rates are the outgrowth of years and years of experience, and I presume that some sort of a differential of that kind was in effect on the roads before there was any Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman is right about that and that is what Commissioner Esch said about it.

Mr. NEWTON. I did know, back in 1922 and 1923, when there was a matter before the Merchant Marine Committee, what that differential was between the domestic rate on wheat and the export rate on wheat, and it was very substantial. I do not now recall the figures and I do not want to guess at them. However, the movement from Chicago was east rather, of course, than from Chicago west.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman from Nebraska only cited that case to show that steel was given a preferential export rate—is not that correct?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The figures I gave are in the hearings and were stated by the commissioner himself.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman gave it to illustrate the policy of having an export rate on steel.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That one branch of industry has been preferred, apparently, as against another and that the particular agency of the Government that has the power to correct it does not do it. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. It seems to me that a fair comparison would be the rate on steel from Gary east, and then the rate on wheat from Chicago east.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If the gentleman will permit, that is exactly what would happen. There would be a reduction of 60 per cent on the iron or steel from Gary to England and only a reduction of 6 per cent on the wheat from Gary to England. That is the statement that was made to us.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman permit me to answer the question of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER]?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. As I understand it, this difference in the differential allowed on export steel and steel for domestic use and export wheat and wheat for domestic use is this: The differential is fixed upon the basis of what will move the traffic in order to meet strong competition. It has been found that in order to permit the steel manufacturers in this country to ship their products to the coast and then to the foreign countries—in other words, to export them and meet foreign competition—a certain differential is necessary in order to move the products. Now, the same principle is applied in the export of wheat, but it is not necessary to make the large differential with reference to wheat that is necessary with reference to steel in order to meet foreign competition. That is the principle that is applied.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If I may be permitted by the gentleman to reply, I think that in order to make a market for the steel, it appears that the railroads, if they are charging the American people a fair rate, are allowing the exporter an unfair rate. In order to enable him to reach that foreign market they are giving a freight rate that does not render a fair return to the railroad company, and if I may be permitted further, my understanding of it is that the steel interests were able years ago—we are discussing this ancient action apparently—to secure this rate, and it has never been changed. I may add further that the tariff allows the steel manufacturer on his steel rails, for instance, a duty of about $14 a ton, and if he sells the steel rails here we have to pay it, but if he sells them in Europe he has to meet the competition of the foreign countries, and, perhaps, take $14 a ton less for his steel rails in order to sell them there. The railroads allow him a differential of $12 a ton so he is able to meet this foreign competition, and that is the reason for the reduction which the railroads have given. We have to sell our wheat in foreign competition, and we are asking that we be allowed something similar to this in order to help us market our wheat abroad.

Mr. GARBER. Let me ask the gentleman from Nebraska this one question.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And I may add that I think we need it now worse than the Steel Trust.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] understands from what source the revenue is derived to make up the loss in transporting steel across the country at the export rate of 40 cents a hundred.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; it is made up from somebody else.

Mr. GARBER. It is made up on the high plateau of freight rates in the sections of country that are not adjacent or tributary to water transportation.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. NEWTON. Of course, this is the case: The railroads from Mississippi River points to the west coast are laid there with facilities not only to handle export business but more largely to serve the territory in between. The roads are there, and there is an overhead, and if there is not a rate that will move the traffic to a given market, then that traffic is not going to be moved and the railroads will not profit anything by reason of the traffic. That is the theory that must be considered in the establishment of a freight rate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. GARBER. I ask the gentleman from Kansas to yield me a little more time.

Mr. AYRES. I yield the gentleman from Oklahoma 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 55 minutes, and unanimous consent will be required to extend the time beyond one hour.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may use such time as may be yielded to him by the gentleman from Kansas or by the gentleman from Idaho.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman is recognized for such time as may be yielded to him.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma yield for a question?

Mr. GARBER. I thank the floor leader for his very considerate action.

I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The gentleman from Oklahoma has demonstrated that he has been a close student of this important transportation question. The gentleman has had much experience on the Territorial, the State, and the Federal bench and has acquired the habit of weighing fairly and impartially these big questions, and I am sure has been a student of government.

The Constitution provides that the Members of Congress shall be allocated to the different parts of the United States for the purpose of securing representation not only of the part of the country from which they come, but the people whom they represent. The Constitution, I am sure the gentleman has considered, provides that the Congress shall have exclusive power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce. To discharge this constitutional duty of Congress, the Interstate Commerce Commission has been created as the agency of Congress to do the thing about which the gentleman has suggested complaint and imperfections. I have been wondering if the gentleman has considered a plan or program by which the Interstate Commerce Commission, as the agency of Congress, can more expeditiously and more wisely discharge the duties of Congress in regulating interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. GARBER. I shall attempt to address myself to that very question which was previously asked me by the gentleman from Kansas in charge of the time, who has been so liberal in its apportionment to me, leaving out a vast amount of material which I intended to present here. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. We are all interested in the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. GARBER. I want to call attention to this feature. I am only criticising the commission in so far as it permitted its attention to be diverted to the program involved in the act of 1920, and that is the extent of my criticism—in permitting the diversion of its attention from a more serviceable field in the administration for the people.

Congress is subject to criticism because it failed to provide additional machinery for the administration. If you will read the recommendations of the commission you will find recommendation No. 1, which has been carried in the report of the commission for six years, asking Congress to undertake remedial legislation.

Recommendation No. 2 has been carried in the annual report of the commission for five years, asking remedial legislation, and so on, with the various recommendations it has made to Congress from year to year. And yet Congress has not been responsive. So that the two bodies in my judgment are subject to severe criticism, as pointed out by the President in reference to the delay in fixing of the rates for carrying the mails.

Mr. RAYBURN. While we have ignored the recommendations, they could have been easily taken up and disposed of in the six months we have been considering railroad consolidation.

Mr. DENISON. It ought to be said in all fairness that that was recommended by the commission.

Mr. RAYBURN. That was a small amendment——

Mr. DENISON. When the bill was brought out it would meet with considerable opposition.

Mr. GARBER. Recommendation No. 3 has been carried in the report of the commission for four years, asking for the removal of an unworkable provision that absolutely blocked consolidation. That has not been removed.

Now, I must approach directly the remedy that I have in mind. It is only a suggestion, but I offer it for your consideration. Remember that rate revision is the most important service and everything else should give way to its administration.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. I do not think the gentleman meant to criticise the whole of Congress—the committee should be criticised, and Congress perhaps ought to be criticised for not amending the rules.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is correct in his keen discrimination of responsibility, but that opens up a broader field than the time will permit me to consider. [Laughter.] The commission asked Congress for authority to delegate its power to individual members of the commission and to specify the employees for the performance of specified duties. They asked that in order to remedy the chaotic rate condition existing throughout the country.

Now, for the performance of ministerial duties the commission is authorized to employ what assistance may be necessary in the way of experts, accountants, and professional and special skill.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. What would the gentleman think of a law dividing the United States into as many districts as we have members of the commission and requiring that each district be represented by a member?

Mr. GARBER. I shall reach the necessity for having representation on the commission if I am permitted to proceed for another 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for 25 minutes.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the control of the time is in the possession of the gentleman from Idaho and the gentleman from Kansas, and has been fixed by order of the House. The committee can not, by unanimous consent or otherwise, override that order.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, the gentleman from Oklahoma was granted 25 minutes by unanimous consent of the committee, and I fear that the Chair has figured it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The extension allowed the gentleman was 10 minutes; that made five minutes beyond the hour, and unanimous consent was given for the gentleman to proceed for five minutes beyond the hour. The gentleman from Oklahoma now asks for an extension of 25 minutes, and that time must be yielded to him by the gentlemen in charge of the bill, on one side or the other.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, as I recall, objection was made to the extension of time beyond the hour, and the gentleman from Connecticut rose and asked unanimous consent that the extension might be made. It seems to me that that would make an extension beyond the hour of 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] misunderstood. The Chair interrupted the gentleman from Oklahoma to inform him that he had consumed 55 minutes of time, and to give him warning that he had but 5 minutes more to conclude the hour. He now asks for more time and the gentleman from Idaho is recognized.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] has been very fine in yielding time, and I would like to yield 10 minutes more, but the only way that I can do it is to ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma. I shall be compelled to say, however, that the demands for time are such that I would not be able to extend the gentleman's time beyond that. I shall ask unanimous consent to yield 10 minutes' time to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, under what condition is it so necessary that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER] must be shut off with 10 minutes? I want information as to why it should be so necessary to do this, when we are killing time in Congress now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] has not used as much time as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES], and there remains to his credit in the balance 25 minutes, in order to equalize the time. No agreement has been reached as to the limitation of time. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from Idaho desires to yield 10 minutes of the 25 minutes at his command?

Mr. FRENCH. I shall do that, and I have asked unanimous consent to be granted that privilege, and may I just make this observation in reply to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD]? So far as I am concerned, I am agreeable to permitting this general debate to run on, but, as chairman of the subcommittee in control of the time here, I have indicated to Members of the House approximately the time when they would be recognized. Some of them have been waiting here an hour, and it is hardly fair to those Members, much as we would like to accommodate others, to ask them to wait any longer. It is merely in the interest of what is usually regarded as orderly procedure.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I recall that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER] waited here this afternoon for two hours, and if the gentleman can only give him 10 minutes in which he may be heard further, I think I shall have to make the point of no quorum, because I think everybody ought to hear him.

Mr. FRENCH. I hope the gentleman will withhold that point. I have already asked unanimous consent to grant him 10 minutes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. But the gentleman wants 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary to ask unanimous consent, inasmuch as the request made by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] was agreed to. The gentleman yields 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FRENCH. If the consent is granted I will be glad to yield the time.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] seems to attach some condition to his yielding of the 10 minutes. I do not think any precedent of that kind ought to be established in the committee. The gentleman from Idaho has absolute control of one-half of the time, and he can yield it or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Oklahoma for 10 minutes more.

Mr. MAPES. But the minds of the gentleman from Idaho and of the Chairman do not seem to meet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho has no parliamentary right to ask his fellow Members for unanimous consent, when none is necessary.

Mr. MAPES. I think the Chair is right in that respect, but I understood the gentleman from Idaho yielded the time with some condition attached to it, and there ought not to be any condition attached.

The CHAIRMAN. Possibly the Chair was presumptuous in not recognizing the condition. He now asks the gentleman from Idaho what his request is in the matter.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to encumber the RECORD with this sort of discussion. My condition is hardly a condition, it was more the expression of a wish that the gentleman could conclude in 10 minutes. I do not care to make any condition. I am glad to yield 10 minutes.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, in response to the liberality of the gentleman from Idaho, I will say that I do not want to be put in the position of taking up time that should be allotted to other Members. Therefore I shall not use the 10 minutes he has been gracious enough to yield to me, but will yield them back that they may be given to other members of the committee. I thank the committee for its patient consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LETTS].

Mr. LETTS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to bring to the attention of the House some conditions which relate to the Rock Island Arsenal, which is in the Mississippi River between Rock Island, Ill., and Davenport, Iowa, which is my home. This arsenal is contiguous to my district. The employees of that arsenal live in Davenport, in Rock Island, and in Moline, and the surrounding towns.

The matter which I wish to talk to you about pertains to the employment conditions which exist at that arsenal. The arsenal, as it is well known, is the best and the largest which this Government possesses. It has a capacity for the employment of more than 20,000 men. It is equipped with high-grade machines, tools, and other devices for the performance of all necessary work in the manufacture of munitions and war materials. At the present time there are employed at that arsenal about 700 men. Those men are employed largely in taking care of the property of the Government. The machines at stated times are greased and then later the dry grease must be taken off and fresh grease put on, and many of the men are employed for no greater purpose than that. Some of these men are from time to time engaged in the manufacture of some article which is required by another department of the Government. There is not much opportunity for such employment and that is the particular thing to which I wish to draw the attention of the Members to-day. At this time there is but little in the way of manufacture of war materials and munitions, items which require trained knowledge and technical skill, and yet while the Government is in need of a great many manufactured articles it seems to have been developed as the policy in the War Department that this splendid plant and others like it throughout the country should remain idle, that the machines shall rust, and that we should purchase the things we need rather than manufacture them. The commandant at the arsenal, Col. David M. King, is a man of splendid ability. He knows his job in an administrative way. He understands the art and science of manufacturing. Not only that, but he has an aptitude for getting along with his men; he understands their problems and is sympathetic with them. In a unique way he is able to stand between that institution and the communities which are adjacent to it and enjoys the confidence of all.

I am very glad, indeed, to pay him as high a compliment as I may with respect to the performance of his duty there and his relationship to the public. The thing I wish to draw to your attention is not in criticism of him nor of his superiors as men. It is in criticism of a policy which has been adopted here in the War Department. Recently Mr. Robbins, the Assistant Secretary of War, in testifying before the Senate Committee on Appropriations, said that a request had been made by the War Department for $500,000 for immediate use in the purchase of light tanks and for an authorization for a contract for a million and a half to spread out over the next few years, making a total of $2,000,000 to be expended on light tanks. He explained that by purchasing 100 of them now, which he wishes to do under a contract, they can be purchased at a saving to the Government of $16,000 per tank. Now, the question is, Why does he propose to a legislative committee that he purchase those tanks when we have a factory that is properly equipped for the manufacture of them? At this point I wish to ask the Clerk to read an editorial by Ralph W. Cram, editor of the Davenport Democrat and Leader.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the article.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

MAKE THOSE TANKS AT ROCK ISLAND ARSENAL

An Iowa man at Washington, Assistant Secretary of War Charles B. Robbins, urges upon the Senate Appropriations Committee the building of 100 modern light tanks instead of the 5 which seems to be named in the annual Army supply bill.

The Government can save $16,000 on each light tank if 100 tanks are purchased by contract, says Mr. Robbins. The small sum allowed for such tanks in the present Budget, Mr. Robbins points out, would buy five or six, at $40,000 each. If we ordered 100, delivered over a period of five years, they could be bought for $24,000 each. That is because each tank is armor-plated, and it is just as expensive a process to set up the rolls to make the plate for 5 tanks as to make it for 100. One setting up and one dismantling would be required for five and no more for the larger number.

Very good advice, Mr. Robbins, to which we would offer but one amendment. Have the tanks made at Rock Island Arsenal instead of by contract. The Government has expended millions on a plant here at which tanks and many other kinds of war material and Government supplies might well be manufactured, and it is standing practically idle.

Nothing could be plainer, from the news reports of Mr. Robbins's recommendation, than the deliberate policy of the War Department to leave the big Government arsenals substantially abandoned and give out practically all Government work by private contract. And it is not a policy that ought to commend itself to Congress.

Here at Rock Island Arsenal exist all the facilities needed for building tanks such as those under discussion. Tanks have been built here experimentally. And it is proposed to ignore the facilities that are standing idle, and the enormous investments that have been made, on the theory that private business contractors need to be "educated" in the making of war materials, so that they may be ready for orders in connection with any national emergency.

It is a policy that commends itself to the private contractors, of course, but when it is adopted the country's big arsenals might as well be junked.

Mr. LETTS. Just why, may I ask, at this time when we are gathering every force possible to discourage war, to bring an end to war; just why is it necessary or proper that the War Department of this Government should announce and declare an exact purpose, that we should encourage private industry by giving them orders for war materials and munitions? May I say to you that in my judgment there is no element of force that will sooner bring to us a state of warfare than to encourage private manufacturers in the manufacture of munitions and war materials to a point where they will rely upon such orders for their profits. [Applause.] And what is going on here? In our midst at this time there is a movement on for the favorable action of the Rules Committee on a bill introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOBIN] and voted out of his committee, which is called "the educational orders bill," (H. R. 450).

It will be remembered that the national defense act provides that war munitions must be made in the Government arsenals and Government manufacturing plants when they can be produced there upon an economical basis. It is proposed by this bill that the very last vestige of work that is left with these arsenals and Government plants is to be taken away from them under this policy of the War Department, for I assume the bill reflects the policy of the department; under that bill it is proposed to amend the national defense act so that the items requiring technical knowledge, which are about the only ones left in the arsenals, shall be let out to the private manufacturers. They want to repeal that part of the national defense act and allow the Secretary of War to place contracts where he pleases, designating them "educational orders." Orders requiring technical knowledge are to be placed with such select private manufacturers as the Secretary of War, acting within his absolute discretion, may see fit to choose, and without any limitation or restraint whatever.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LETTS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yesterday a bill along that line was on the Consent Calendar, and I had it marked with a great big red mark. I want to inform the gentleman that I believe that an attempt will be made to obtain recognition to pass that bill under suspension of the rules. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will get his friends here and help defeat it.

Mr. LETTS. I am pleased to have that statement from the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LETTS. I yield to my friend from New York.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I think when that bill was reported it limited the amount that can be expended to a definite amount each year and also provided, as I recall, that there shall be competition between the various industries in applying for those orders.

Mr. LETTS. I will say to the gentleman that it is true there is the appearance of competition. The bill provides that the Secretary of War shall advertise for bids, but he is not bound to accept the lowest or the best bid. The bill which I have before me specifically repeals that part of the national defense act and provides only that the Secretary of War shall look at these bids and then make his own selection.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I did not intend to engage in debate on this particular bill. The only point I desired to make really was that the bill as reported by the committee is a very different bill from the bill which was originally introduced.

I would like to add for the benefit of the gentleman from Iowa and the members of the committee that the War Department has given a great deal of time to the consideration of this subject, and that bill represents its solution of what seems to be a desirable end. But there has been a tremendous amount of time and consideration given to the proposition, and a very different bill was brought out by the War Department in the bill originally introduced.

Mr. LETTS. A great deal of thought has been given to the subject. This thought has been developing for a long time, and it has operated to gradually take away this work that belonged to the arsenals and give it to private industry.

I agree with the distinguished gentleman from New York that to a certain point there may be some desirability in that policy, but when it is said that it is important to place these orders with private manufacturers in order that they may understand the needs of the Government, that they may have the secrets with respect to process and manufacture which the Government arsenals possess, and that they shall have our plans and specifications laid out in private offices and broadcast throughout the country among our manufacturing plants, I assert that policy would destroy the secrecy which ordinarily has accompanied the manufacture of such products at Rock Island Arsenal, where they have protected those secrets, not only by armed guards but by high barbed-wire fences, heavily charged with electric current.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Whatever competitive features may be included in that bill, we surely should not make it mandatory to give those contracts to private manufacturers.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. The gentleman will agree with me, I think, in the statement that the purpose of these educational orders will give to the private manufacturers the knowledge that is necessary to enable them to operate efficiently when an emergency comes, and thus avoid the most disastrous situation which existed when this country went into the war, with none of our industries having the slightest knowledge of the technical plans and technical instruments that they were required to make.

Mr. LETTS. I think what the gentleman points out illustrates exactly my point, that the giving out of these secrets to the manufacturers of the country denies the avowed purpose of the bill and would prevent proper and suitable preparedness.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. How are we to expect them to meet the responsibility devolving upon them unless we give them the knowledge they need?

Mr. LETTS. I am glad the gentleman asked that question, because it leads me to the point that I wish to stress to-day; and that is that in time of war we must necessarily give out large contracts for munitions for the conduct of war, and therefore it is absolutely necessary that in our arsenals and navy yards we should retain a body of skilled men, carefully trained men, who may go out in the time of emergency and at the behest of the Government into private plants and become foremen and direct operations. [Applause.]

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LETTS. Yes; I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I say I entirely agree with the gentleman on that, and I believe the members of the Committee on Military Affairs do also. Of course, the necessary skill and knowledge and mastery of the arts, if you please, should be retained in the arsenals and the Government establishments, as well as in private industry, inasmuch as the burden will fall upon them both. I do not understand that the proposition involved in the so-called educational orders bill will interfere in any way with the placing of such orders with the arsenals and navy yards.

Mr. LETTS. Perhaps not; but the thing I am complaining about is that they have abandoned the arsenals, at least they are not keeping them up.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. That is a different matter.

Mr. LETTS. We have a plant at Rock Island capable of giving employment to 20,000 men, where we have now 700 men, and many of them unskilled laborers to do odd jobs around the arsenal.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I agree with the gentleman that the arsenals should be kept up.

Mr. LETTS. We have there 999 acres of land and a property value of $380,000,000, all this lying idle. In that connection may I call attention to a policy which has prevailed there? I brought with me to-day two exact cases. Two or three years ago it came to my attention that the arsenal had submitted a bid, or, I may more properly say, an estimate, upon the reconditioning of some 550 Liberty motors, and although the arsenal was the low bidder by $15 or more per motor—it being a small contract—the contract was let to a private concern at a cost of $9,000 over the estimate of the arsenal.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may insert at the conclusion of my remarks certain telegrams and certain correspondence which I had with various persons in authority respecting that particular contract, in order to illustrate my point.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LETTS. I also ask unanimous consent to include, following that, a statement concerning another contract which was up just a short time ago with respect to letter boxes which were wanted by the Post Office Department.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LETTS. The thought is this: The arsenals have only the privilege of submitting estimates, and when another department advertises for bids it receives the estimate of the arsenal and the binding bids of private manufacturers; such department finds it to its advantage to accept the bid of a private manufacturer and discards the arsenal estimate because, it is said, that if the cost exceeds the estimate, nevertheless, it must pay the full cost. Upon that point I wish to say that in the fall of 1927 I had Colonel Jenks, who was in charge of production at the arsenal, make a statement of the various contracts that had been taken from other departments of the Government from January 1, 1924. It includes 37 contracts and shows that the total estimated cost for those 37 contracts was $228,282.88, and the total reported cost was $223,056.40, being well within the aggregate of the estimates. As I remember, only in one or two instances during that period of time did the actual cost exceed the estimate, but within the whole period of time there was a profit earned, but the profit could not be taken since the arsenal was only permitted to accept from the departments of the Government seeking the service the actual cost of the work done.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is not the intention that an arsenal shall be conducted for profit?

Mr. LETTS. Not at all; and yet they are euchred out of these contracts because the Post Office Department or the Department of Commerce, which wants some materials for the lighting of airways, or some other department, says, "We can not take your figures because they are an estimate. What we prefer to know is exactly where we stand and so we take the binding bid of some private manufacturer."

What I would like to do—and I have proposed it—is to amend the law and allow the arsenal to make binding bids upon proposals coming from other departments of the Government. My suggestion has been that a revolving fund be created on which you may draw for a deficit on any particular job and into which may go the profit on any contract, and that the War Department be permitted to take from the other departments of the Government the amount agreed upon and not be limited to its costs.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman has served in Congress long enough to know that we constantly have before us bills rescinding bonds or appropriating money to make up deficiencies in estimates for private concerns, and it seems to me the same consideration should be given to Government institutions.

Mr. LETTS. I thank the gentleman for that suggestion; it is a very valuable contribution to this discussion. It is my impression that it would be a wholesome thing, not only for the men who are employed in these arsenals but for the employers of labor in the communities around them. We find that manufacturers near the Rock Island Arsenal think there is a disturbing influence because of the unsettled labor conditions which exist at the arsenal, and surely it ought not be so. I am not asking that the maximum use be made of the Rock Island Arsenal or any of the arsenals of the United States, but I do say that in the interest of good business and in the interest of fair play to those who are dependent upon that industry that we make a reasonable peace-time use of the plants. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. LETTS. Mr. Chairman, about a year ago I asked the Chief of Ordnance if he would cooperate with me in making a study of the Rock Island Arsenal in order to determine its proper peace-time use. He very kindly consented to do that and did do so. I have the result of that study in my hands.

It is not all that I wanted, because it only deals with the necessity which an Army officer sees in the situation with respect to those things which are naturally and normally required for war purposes. My idea was—and I tried to make it plain—if we did not have work enough to keep this plant reasonably employed in the manufacture of munitions and war materials, we ought to reach out and assist other departments of the Government and at the same time aid and assist the War Department in the conduct of its arsenal.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to insert at the close of my remarks the study to which I have referred.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five more minutes.

Mr. LETTS. I am willing there should be a compromise between these opposing views, but if we are going to let out these contracts to the private manufacturers throughout the country, let us accompany this with some kind of reasonable use of our own facilities and not let them lie idle and permit the machines to rust. Let us build up the personnel of the plant and establish an organization which can quickly expand in event of war.

It is surely unnecessary to call attention to the fact that when the World War broke out it was necessary for us to attract laboring men, skilled mechanics, and others from all parts of the country at great expense, and to offer them pay which was entirely out of reason with any experience they had ever had in the industrial world. Not only this, but we paid the freight on their household goods and bore the transportation charges for the members of their families and assembled around these plants many men who became dependent upon the plants and have now been thrown out into the community, making it necessary for the community to absorb them in its industrial life or encourage them to drift away to some other part of the country.

This is my thought: I believe it is just and proper that we should get some return from the investments we have in these large plants, and that we should do justice to the men who are employed there, who have given up their lives to these industries, and at the same time we can be somewhat reasonable about granting contracts to individuals throughout the country, but not to the extent that we would go if we adopt the policy of the War Department as it is set out in this educational orders bill and as evidenced by their utterances and writings on the subject.

My closing thought is this: There is not only an economic question involved, one that involves business methods and business policies, but we are branching out on a policy that will lead us into war instead of keeping us at peace with the world.

Why should we encourage private manufacturers to expect from the Government orders for the manufacture of munitions and war materials that will put profits into their pockets and will lead to the time when they will say, "We require these orders; it is not only a convenience, but we have got to the point where we must have them; we have been encouraged to expect them." If they reach that point we will have a real war party within our borders.

Mrs. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LETTS. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS. Does not the gentleman realize that these orders would probably be very small and that the manufacturers, as a matter of fact, as a financial matter do not want to undertake these orders? We have never been prepared for any war and it has always taken us months to prepare for war in even the slightest degree.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have made a pretty good job of it.

Mrs. ROGERS. With the assistance of other countries.

Mr. LETTS. What the lady from Massachusetts says is true, and amplifies my argument better than I could myself, because our arsenals are standing idle and they should be at work developing new devices and keeping abreast of the world in its knowledge and research necessary to preparedness.

Mrs. ROGERS. Then the gentleman would feel that the arsenals would develop a war party if we kept them going?

Mr. LETTS. In reply to the lady I would say that whatever is done in the way of preparation for war should be done deliberately by the Government with full knowledge of the extent to which it wishes to go and with a full realization of the consequences, and not place this responsibility in the hands of private manufacturers who are looking for the profits that are involved.

Mrs. ROGERS. Will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. LETTS. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS. The placing of these orders would be entirely in the hands of the Government.

Mr. LETTS. If it were so, that authority would rest with the Congress, where it belongs, but this bill places it within the discretion and within the conscience of the Secretary of War alone.

Mrs. ROGERS. Does not the Secretary of War know more what is needed in order to carry on a war?

Mr. LETTS. Yes; the Secretary of War should know what is needed. That is why we have him there.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He should know.

Mr. LETTS. But it is not necessary for us to agree with him respecting policies relating to preparedness.

Mrs. ROGERS. Has lack of preparedness ever prevented our entering any war?

Mr. LETTS. The American people do not go to war from choice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. LETTS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to by Mr. LETTS is as follows:

DAVENPORT, IOWA, June 24, 1925.

Maj. Gen. MASON M. PATRICK,
Chief of the Air Service, Washington, D. C.:

Will you hold up contract with Allison Engineering Co. for reconditioning Liberty motors until you see my letter, which is mailed to-day?

F. DICKINSON LETTS, M. C.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 26, 1925.

F. DICKINSON LETTS,
Member of Congress, Davenport, Iowa:

494 F. Received telegram June 24. Contract with Allison Engineering Co. already executed.

PATRICK, Chief of Air Service.

DAVENPORT, IOWA, June 24, 1925.

Hon. J. R. MCCARL,
Comptroller General of the United States,
Washington, D. C.:

I am asking Chief of the Air Service by wire to hold up contract for reconditioning Liberty motors until he receives letter which I am mailing to-day. I am writing you upon the same subject and feel that the contents of my letters to you and the Chief of the Air Service should be known before action is taken.

F. DICKINSON LETTS, M. C.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 25, 1925.

Hon. F. DICKINSON LETTS,
Davenport, Iowa:

Matter referred to in your wire 24th not now before me, but will be pleased to have such matters as you may submit for future consideration.

MCCARL, Comptroller General.

JUNE 27, 1925.

President COOLIDGE,
Swampscott, Mass.:

Chief of Air Service is letting contract to recondition 500 Liberty motors to Allison Engineering Co., of Indianapolis, at a cost of more than $8,000 over the bid of the Rock Island Arsenal. Rock Island Arsenal is fully equipped with machines and tools to do this work and was the low bidder. On June 24 I wired Chief of Air Service to hold up contract until he should receive my letter mailed that day. At 7 p. m., June 26, Chief of Air Service wired me that contract was executed with Allison Engineering Co. I feel that there has been a discrimination against Rock Island Arsenal at unnecessary cost to Government of more than $8,000. May I have your support in my effort to place this contract where it belongs to save this money for the Government?

F. DICKINSON LETTS, M. C.

JUNE 27, 1925.

Maj. Gen. MASON M. PATRICK,
Chief of the Air Service, Washington, D. C.:

Your message indicates that contract for reconditioning Liberty motors is executed with Allison Engineering Co. What appears to be a discrimination against the Rock Island Arsenal is costing the Government on this small item more than $8,000. I am communicating by wire with the Comptroller General of the United States and with the President. I am unable to understand the necessity for such speedy action nor the reason why the Government should pay $8,000 more than is necessary for this work.

F. DICKINSON LETTS, M. C.

JUNE 27, 1925.

Hon. J. R. MCCARL,
Comptroller General of the United States,
Washington, D. C.:

Message from Chief of the Air Service indicates that contract with Allison Engineering Co. for reconditioning Liberty motors, which under competitive bids should have gone to Rock Island Arsenal, was executed June 24 with Allison Engineering Co. This discrimination against Rock Island Arsenal is costing the United States more than $8,000. May I have your support in this matter in my effort to save this money for the Government and to place the contract where it belongs under the proposal for bids?

F. DICKINSON LETTS, M. C.

MY DEAR MAJOR GENERAL PATRICK: It comes to my attention that recently you called for competitive bids for the reconditioning of 500 Liberty motors. It is reported that the Rock Island Arsenal made a bid of $573 per motor for the first 100 and $473 per motor for the next 400 motors. That the Allison Engineering Co., of Indianapolis, Ind., made a bid of $595 per motor for the first 100 motors and $488 per motor for the next 400 motors, and that the Steel Products Engineering Co. made a bid of $669.50 per motor for the first 100 motors and $539.50 per motor for the next 400 motors.

It is further reported that you have announced that the contract will be let to the Allison Engineering Co., per the terms of its bid, which aggregates more than $8,000 over the bid of the Rock Island Arsenal. I understand the reason for letting the contract to the Allison Engineering Co., over the more favorable bid of the Rock Island Arsenal, is because you believe that it is of advantage to the Government to encourage private industry in the belief that the Rock Island Arsenal would not be able to do work of this kind in times of war and that we should, therefore, have privately owned plants equipped to do this particular kind of work.

I wish to call your attention to the fact that it seems entirely desirable that this work should go to the Rock Island Arsenal. It is important that the Rock Island should maintain its organization and a sufficient force of workmen to provide a nucleus for an increased organization in case of war. It is also desirable to make use of the splendid plant and its excellent equipment in the way of machines and tools. The Government has an investment in the Rock Island Arsenal of approximately $380,000,000. It means much to the Government and much to this community to have this arsenal efficiently maintained.

It would also seem not only advisable but the part of justice that, having entered a competitive bid, the arsenal should be awarded the contract because of the fact that its bid was the lowest.

Personally it seems to me that if we are practicing economy, as we say it is our purpose to do, this contract ought to be given to the Rock Island Arsenal.

Very sincerely,

F. DICKINSON LETTS, M. C.

Maj. Gen. MASON M. PATRICK,
Chief of the Air Service, Washington, D. C.

The Government has an investment in the Rock Island Arsenal of approximately $380,000,000. It means much to the Government and much to this community to have this arsenal efficiently maintained.

It would also seem not only advisable but the part of justice that having entered a competitive bid the arsenal should be awarded the contract because of the fact that its bid was the lowest.

I am writing to you upon this matter thinking that you, more than anyone else, can bring the matters which I have stated to the attention of all those connected with the transaction in behalf of the Government. Personally, it seems to me that if we are practicing economy as we say it is our purpose to do, this contract ought to be given to the Rock Island Arsenal.

I am writing a similar letter to Major General Patrick, Chief of the Air Service.

Very sincerely,

F. DICKINSON LETTS, M. C.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF AIR SERVICE,
Washington, June 27, 1925.

Hon. F. DICKINSON LETTS,
Member of Congress, Davenport, Iowa.

MY DEAR MR. LETTS: I have your letter of the 24th instant about the contract recently let for reconditioning 500 Liberty motors. Please believe that I am likewise much interested in the maintenance of Government arsenals and realize that there should be retained in these arsenals a nucleus of skilled workmen in order that the force may be properly increased in time of war.

So far as this particular contract is concerned, I think you will realize that the arsenal did not and could not name a fixed price. It merely submitted its estimate of the cost of doing the work. Should the cost prove to be greater than the estimate, and this was the case in a previous contract which the arsenal was given, the Air Service funds would have to be drawn upon for such extra amount. The difference between the bid of the Allison Co. and the estimate of the arsenal was very small.

Furthermore, in the estimate of the arsenal it was stated that delivery of the reconditioned motors would begin in 10 months, whereas the Allison Co. offered to begin delivery in 3 months. The Air Service needs these motors badly. The lesser time named by the Allison Co. and the fact that its bid was so close to the arsenal estimate convinced the War Department that it was wiser to award the contract in this case to the Allison Co.

I am, of course, glad that you brought this matter to my attention, and I hope that you will realize that very careful consideration was given to it.

Very sincerely,

MASON M. PATRICK,
Major General, A. S., Chief of Air Service.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 7, 1925.

Hon. F. D. LETTS,
Member of Congress, Davenport, Iowa.

MY DEAR MR. LETTS: Your telegram of June 27, 1925, addressed to the President, concerning the letting of a contract by the Air Service for reconditioning Liberty motors, has been referred to me for reply. In your telegram you say you feel that there has been a discrimination against the Rock Island Arsenal in letting this contract, at an unnecessary cost to the Government of more than $8,000.

The facts are as follows: The Rock Island Arsenal was, in accordance with law, asked to submit a proposal for doing this work. The figure submitted by the arsenal, $473 per motor, was not a firm bid but merely an estimate of its cost. There was no guaranty that this estimate would not be exceeded.

The figure named by the Allison Engineering Co., $488 per motor, was a firm bid and, as it will be noted, was only $15 higher than the estimate of the arsenal.

Furthermore, when the arsenal submitted its estimate, it was stated that delivery of these reconditioned motors would commence in 10 months. The Allison Engineering Co. bid promised commencement of delivery of these reconditioned motors in three months. The Air Service is urgently in need of these reconditioned motors.

This whole matter was very carefully considered and the bid of the Allison Engineering Co. was decided to be the most advantageous and, therefore, in the interest of the United States, I authorized the Chief of Air Service to accept it and to contract accordingly.

There has been no discrimination against the Rock Island Arsenal on the part of the War Department. This I think you will see very clearly when you consider the facts set forth above.

Very truly yours,

J. A. HINES,
Acting Secretary of War.

MAY 26, 1928.

Hon. F. DICKINSON LETTS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN LETTS: Referring to your visit to this office to-day in connection with the estimate submitted by the Rock Island Arsenal for supplying letter-box equipment for use in the Postal Service during the next fiscal year, I find upon investigation that the arsenal submitted an estimate with the following clause:

"In view of statutory provisions, the bid herewith quoted is an estimate, and the material covered hereby will be delivered to the purchaser at cost. Should the actual cost exceed the amount quoted herein, the purchaser is required to pay the excess cost, there being no ordnance funds legally applicable; and should the material be completed at a cost less than estimated herein, the price to the purchaser will be decreased accordingly."

It is quite clear from the above that the prices quoted by the Rock Island Arsenal are not fixed or definite, and if the actual cost of producing the equipment is more than the estimate, the Post Office Department would be required to pay the additional cost.

Previous experience with the Navy Department in accepting estimates proved very costly to this department. In the fiscal year 1917 bids were requested for supplying No. 1 storage boxes. The Navy Department submitted an estimate of $10.80 per box. A commercial concern quoted the next lowest price at $12.80 per box. The contract was awarded to the Navy Department, and when the order was completed the additional cost on that one lot was $1,927.20, which brought the cost of the box up to $14.65.

On the second lot an additional cost of $3,552.28 was charged the department, which brought the price of the box to $18.56.

During the fiscal year 1923 the Washington Navy Yard submitted an estimate for supplying letter-box equipment at the following prices:

	Each
100 No. 1 zinc boxes at	$6.92
1,000 No. 1 brass boxes at	9.72
4,000 No. 1 steel boxes at	4.77
2,000 No. 2 steel boxes at	6.75
1,000 package boxes at	18.36
1,500 combination boxes at	21.775

The above prices were similar to those quoted by an outside concern. At the estimated prices the boxes listed above would have cost the department $94,014.50. Actually the department paid $128,876.75, or an advance of over 36 per cent. The final costs per box were as follows:

	Each
No. 1 zinc	$12.08
No. 1 brass	15.053
No. 1 steel	8.511
No. 2 steel	10.273
Package	20.746
Combination	24.849

There can not be found any statutory provision requiring that an estimate be furnished to the Post Office Department by any branch of the Government for furnishing equipment and supplies. The Revised Statutes provide that competitive bids shall be asked for and the award of contract made to the lowest responsible bidder.

It is the opinion of this office that the Post Office Department can not give consideration to an estimate submitted through competitive bidding, and the only remedy that I can see is to have some legislation enacted that will permit the Post Office Department to give proper consideration to bids from the arsenals or other Government manufacturing plants.

The award of contract for the letter boxes on the items on which the Rock Island Arsenal bid was made to the Van Dorn Iron Works Co., Cleveland, Ohio.

With best wishes and kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

T. L. DEGNAN, Purchasing Agent.

A STUDY OF THE PEACE-TIME ORGANIZATION DESIRABLE FOR ROCK ISLAND ARSENAL

1. This study is based upon the requirements for expansion of the small recuperator shop (Shop DM and shops operated as auxiliary to it—DO, DS, AJ—as a single organization) and the shops which would needs be put into operation as a result of expansion of shop DM for operations after M day.

2. It is assumed that shop administrative personnel could be obtained from outside sources and that only such force of expert workmen should be maintained in time of peace as required to provide for the instruction and training of workmen for operations which are special to this arsenal and to provide such production personnel as necessary to transmit the technical requirements of production to the rapidly expanded organization after M day. Only a few of the personnel developed in a shop are capable of such use, and the shop organization must be large enough to make sure that these few essential experts are developed.

3. The requirements for toolmakers and die sinkers on M day is exceedingly difficult to estimate. Although it is the policy of the department to produce manufacturing facilities before M day, it is foreseen that the special facilities provided will be far from complete and that the arsenal must be prepared to expand its own tool-room organization with the greatest possible rapidity, as well as to take every advantage of utilizing commercial plants where special facilities can be made. Toolmakers trained during peace time are not only necessary for expansion of the tool-room organization but constitute a most desirable source of supply of men for duty as inspectors, technical advisers to production personnel on the requirements of manufacture, supervisors, etc. The demand for such men on M day will far exceed any possible supply at this arsenal. The total demands of the whole country for toolmakers for war production must be expected to be so great as to constitute a special problem.

4. In the manufacture of recuperators the principal special operations which are peculiar to recoil mechanisms and which have no parallel in commercial plants are longitudinal lapping and assembly operations known locally as "secret assemblies."

5. It is true that lapping is being widely introduced into the automotive practice. But such lapping differs as widely from the lapping required in recoil mechanisms as some coarse grinding operations differ from fine grinding operations. The workmen trained for rotary lapping of automotive cylinders will not be suitable for training of recuperator lapping. Their standards of workmanship are very much lower, and workmen trained to a low standard of work can not be employed on work of a high standard. Longitudinal lapping is considered essential for recuperator cylinders. So far as known, this method of lapping is used nowhere else.

6. It is possible that other methods of lapping will be developed in the future. The present tendency at this arsenal is toward higher, more accurate degrees of finish. It now appears that if metallic packing is to be successfully developed, a more accurate polishing and finishing of cylinders must be developed at the same time.

7. General experience and studies of the difficulties experienced during the past war in the assembly and recoil mechanisms indicate that these operations are critical and that success in expansion of this plant will be contingent to a large degree upon the retention of a small nucleus of such highly specialized workmen.

8. At present this arsenal has but one workman expert in lapping and but one workman qualified to assemble the secret parts of a recuperator. A second workman has been given a very little training on a small portion of the assembly. Under current conditions there is danger of the department losing the art of manufacturing recuperators, and it is considered that the expert force available is far below that necessary to meet M day requirements.

9. A consideration of the war-production schedules for small-caliber recoil mechanisms tentatively assigned this arsenal and the development of the capacity of the small recuperator plant, leads to the conclusion that 5 expert lappers and 15 expert secret assemblers are the minimum number from which M-day expansion can be met. This allows one assembler only for the medium recuperator shop and none for assignment to Erie Proving Ground or to base repair shops, etc. For this study this minimum number to meet partial requirements is taken, as it is believed that a reasonable program can be worked out to train and hold that number of experts and that a larger program which might be fully justified on the grounds of preparedness could not be worked out within 10 years.

10. The program proposed, therefore, is one to cover the immediate 10-year period, with the expectation that at the end of that period the requirement of the Army and the financial policy of the Government will be such as to permit the adoption of a more reasonable program.

11. The number of experts mentioned above is the minimum for instructing other workmen. After M day it is contemplated that these 20 experts will be used as foremen or instructors—not as production men.

12. For the other difficult operations on recuperators, such as deep drilling and wood-pack reaming, and planing or milling (difficult because of thin walls and intricacy of the cross section), it is contemplated that experts can be obtained from commercial plants and that the arsenal need develop only a comparative few men who can act as technical advisers and in other similar capacity. These operations are not special to the recuperator industry. This study includes no special consideration for this class of expert workmen.

13. The next most important class of workmen to be developed are toolmakers. It is believed that a reasonable minimum force of toolmakers would be 60. There are now 13 employed.

14. The number of machinists for a reasonable minimum peace-time force is 200 and of apprentices of all classes is 25, to secure an available future labor supply. At present there are 69 machinists employed and no apprentices.

15. It will be noted that the proportion of toolmakers recommended is large. This is considered essential because of the high quality of recoil-mechanism work and because of the M-day requirements for high-class workmen.

16. No recommendations are made as to supervisory employees, inspectors, technical experts, engineers, etc. The number of such employees should be fixed by the requirements for progressive, economical production and for progress in the solution of production and engineering questions involved in the development and production of ordnance material and in the preparation of war plans. The plans recommended would permit of the employment of a reasonable number of such a force.

17. The total shop force required to furnish the above number of specialists would be approximately 800 (for shops DM, DO, DS, and AJ).

18. The cost of production orders required to keep this force busy, including that part of the work assigned to minor shops for which personnel requirements are not estimated, and for general overhead and material, is $2,000,000 per year. Under such a program it is estimated that the total allotments to the arsenal for all activities, except the procurement of material for issue or for other arsenals, would approximate $2,500,000 per year.

19. If the recuperator specialists were employed on production of new recuperators only the cost of recuperators per year for the training of this personnel would be $1,250,000. The amount of other work required of this arsenal by this office, plus the amount reasonably expected from other departments, would furnish the total of $2,000,000 for the development of the recuperator-shop organization.

20. Such a program is not recommended, as it does not conform to the policy of his office or to the requirements of the 10-year program for the production of new type artillery. It is considered possible to accomplish the same objective by a much smaller expenditure of ordnance funds.

21. The training of the recuperator specialists recommended above does not require that new recuperators only be produced. The same training of these specialists can be given at far less cost by the adoption of a policy of reconditioning recuperators now in store and deteriorating from corrosion. It is considered that the proper protection of these recuperators against corrosion requires lapping and that the best protection of these recuperators against further deterioration and that adequate plans for M-day requirements require the assembly of these recuperators ready for use. Furthermore, it is believed possible to perfect the materials used in the interior assemblies and the methods of work and possibly of storage so that only minor deterioration of metal surfaces will take place in a period as long as 20 years. For a discussion of this question see O. O. 473.82/1590 (RIA 473.824/2147) and O. O. 412.2/1338 (RIA 412.2/411).

22. Difficulties are being experienced in the service with some recuperators, as the 155 m/m G. P. F. It is considered probable that a part of these difficulties will be found due to large tolerances permitted in lapping cylinders and to corrosion which was formed between the time of lapping and assembly. It is believed that the preservation of these recuperators and their proper functioning will require relapping and reassembly.

23. It is therefore recommended:

(a) That the recuperator specialists required be developed by the adoption of the following program or its equivalent:

(1) Manufacture per year 50 recoil mechanisms, estimated cost, $125,000.

(2) Recondition and reassemble annually three hundred 75-mm. recoil mechanisms, Model 1897 (estimated cost, $75,000); one hundred 155-mm. howitzer recoil mechanisms (estimated cost, $10,000); and fifty 155-mm. G. P. F. recoil mechanisms (estimated cost, $25,000). Total estimated cost of reconditioning program, $110,000. Total cost of whole program, $235,000.

(b) That every effort be made to obtain high-class work from other Government departments, to bring the total funds available to the amount recommended above.

(c) That the maximum of recuperator personnel recommended in (a) (2) above be reached not later than the end of the fiscal year 1930, and that as many more recoil mechanisms as practicable, in addition to the 100 for 75-mm. guns, be ordered during the current fiscal year.

24. The project recommended calls for about $75,000 in manufacturing funds more than available during the current fiscal year and about $81,000 more for maintenance funds than now available for the fiscal year. It calls for $100,000 additional per year in high-grade tool-room work, and if the department's policy permits of assignment of manufacture of special facilities to arsenals, those funds should be available.

25. Outside of $125,000 total for manufacture of new recuperators, $110,000 for reconditioning of recuperators, $100,000 for additional tool-room work, the needs of the small recuperator plant during the next decade can be met by the funds which should be available for production of artillery material and maintenance parts and from funds which should be obtained from other departments.

26. The above study fixes the amount of additional work to be obtained from other departments or from increased activities of the Ordnance Department at $1,000,000 per year in excess of that now being obtained. Were that amount obtained the minimum required for ordnance funds for tool-room work might be decreased, but it is highly desirable that it be made available. At present orders from other departments amount to about $100,000 per year.

27. The following comparative data, taken from arsenal records, is furnished. It pertains to shops DM, D8, DO, and AJ only, which constitutes the artillery vehicle department:

	Number employed
	June 1, 1914	Jan. 1, 1917	Apr. 1, 1917	June 30, 1928	Proposed
Toolmakers and die sinkers	33	30	39	13	60
Tool designers		3	3	4	10
Expert lappers	0	0	0	1	5
Expert secret assemblers	0	0	0	1	15
Machinists	277	257	276	67	200
Machine operators	33	68	82	61	200
Apprentices	13	62	50	0	25
Total, personnel of all classes	647	1,022	1,074	268	810

28. The above study is considered an absolute minimum. Future studies when more data are available, it is believed, will confirm this opinion and point to the necessity of upward revision of this proposal. It is submitted as a practical solution to cover an urgent necessity.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT].

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, we are constantly reminded of the tremendous diversity of opinion in this body as to the requirements of national defense. I am one of those who believe the national defense to be one of the most solemn and important duties cast upon us and that it should be a matter of constant concern to all of us. To-day we are discussing, or should be discussing, naval affairs. The fact that the Senate has not yet passed the so-called cruiser bill which this House passed at the last session and that that bill may come back to the House for further action makes it not inappropriate for some further observations on the measure to be made in this general debate.

The question is constantly being raised as to what the naval ratio between Great Britain and the United States should be. It has always seemed to me, and I believe it to be the preponderating opinion of the American people, that that question was settled and that ratio fixed by the conclusions of the Limitation of Arms Conference held here in Washington in 1922. That conference fixed that battleship strength between the two countries should be equal and that there should be the so-called 5–5–3 ratio between the United States and Great Britain and Japan. To be sure, technically that decision only applied to battleships, but in the minds of our people it was generally understood, so I believe, that it meant and was to apply to naval strength generally. I have not noted in the discussion that we have had here, although it may have been mentioned in the other body, that reference has been made to an important authority, to a very important exponent of public opinion in this country, which has expressed itself on this subject—I refer to the platform adopted at the last Republican National Convention. This is what was there declared, and to which the party then pledged itself:

> We pledge ourselves to round out and maintain the Navy to the full strength provided for the United States by the letter and spirit of the Conference on Limitation of Armament.

Now, what was the letter of the agreement referred to? A 5–5–3 ratio as to battleships. And what was the conception of the platform of the spirit of the agreement? A 5–5–3 ratio as to all parts of the navies of the three powers.

I must say that I am one of those who believe that the decision and arrangement entered into between ourselves and the other powers in that conference should be lived up to and that our Navy should be brought up to a parity, to an equality, with Great Britain in all elements of the fleet. Of course, Mr. Chairman, that does not in any way imply or raise the specter that we are going to have a war with Great Britain. Heaven forbid that the two great branches of the English-speaking people should ever go to war again. It is not only abhorrent, but inconceivable. But, nevertheless, in my judgment the best guaranty for peace and security in this world will be afforded by a parity in naval strength between the two great naval powers of the world. My own hope, my fervent prayer, would be that in any future war we shall be found with her or she with us, as we were in the Great War, and never against each other. It may be that if we have that parity we will be more apt to secure that from which from the beginning of our Government we have contended and striven, namely, the freedom of the seas.

It seems to me we will then be much more apt to secure the concession of those maritime rights for which we have always contended.

Now, on the floor of the House on Saturday my colleague from New York [Mr. FISH] offered some criticism of Great Britain for not having lived up to what he represented to be the spirit of the limitation of arms agreement. He criticized Great Britain because she had gone ahead and developed her cruiser strength.

In my view there is no reason or ground for any criticism of Great Britain in that respect. She was not technically bound in any way by the letter of that agreement. She is entirely free to determine as to her naval strength in the same way as it is for us to determine what shall be our naval strength in the respects not covered by the agreement, in view of her own situation and requirements. At the recent Geneva convention we could not agree. In my judgment, the reason for that disagreement was the diversity of the requirements of the two countries and the difficulty in arriving at an exact formula for an agreement. If it is important, and of course we all concede that it is, that there should be a limitation upon cruiser strength as well as on battleships and that we should reach some agreement, it seems to me that we will be much more apt to secure that desired result, in view of the result of the Geneva conference, if we proceed along our own lines and concede to Great Britain the equal right to proceed according to her own judgment of her requirements. I doubt if much good can come from any further overtures on our part to Great Britain in advance of the conference that must be held in 1931 or from any further attempt to arrive at some agreement in advance of that time.

The 15-cruiser bill has been referred to as embarking us in competitive naval building with Great Britain. As a matter of fact, if the situation is fairly considered, there can be no element of competition involved in our undertaking to increase the cruiser strength of our Navy by 15. The fact of the matter is that we to-day have but 10 modern cruisers to Great Britain's 56, and that if we shall complete the 8 cruisers that we have already authorized and provided for we will have 18 cruisers and when she completes her cruiser program she will have 64.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. My time is so limited that I prefer to defer answering any questions until the conclusion of my remarks. As I was about to say, at the completion of the cruisers that we have authorized, we will have 146,000 tons to Great Britain's 396,000 tons.

What is competition? It is the effort to attain something which another is attempting to attain at the same time; a strife for superiority. When we consider that the completion of this program, and even the realization of the purposes of the 15-cruiser bill, will result in our having but 33 modern cruisers to Great Britain's 64, with a tonnage for the United States of 296,000 tons to Great Britain's 409,000 tons, it seems to me idle to say that that involves competitive building.

Again, my friend from New York stated that he would offer an amendment to the pending appropriation bill which would express the sense of this House to be that the President should call at once another conference with Great Britain to endeavor to arrive at an agreement as to cruiser construction. In my judgment, the time really is not fitting for us to make any further overtures to Great Britain in that regard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. She has met us once on our invitation. We were unable to agree. We disagreed, perhaps, because there was an insoluble problem presented at that time. I can not see what better prospect is held out of a further conference in the near future meeting with any different result from the one held in Geneva. Indeed, it would seem to me inappropriate to extend another invitation so soon. I feel that if we proceed with our program according to what we conceive to be the best interests of this country, then in 1931, when the powers who engaged in the Washington Conference must again convene for a further conference, perhaps we will be in a better position to secure that which we all should so earnestly desire—namely, a further limitation in naval armament. It will be remembered that in 1922 one of the reasons, perhaps the controlling reason, why we were able to secure an agreement at that time was the fact that had our then naval program been realized we would have been put in a position of superiority; and I say, notwithstanding the fact that these 15 cruisers would not bring us up to a position anywhere near a parity, certainly not of superiority, that we will probably be in a better position to engage in a successful conference on this subject than if we undertake to meet Great Britain again when the conditions have not so changed from those which existed at the time we last met as to offer much hope that there will be any different result. Perhaps, it would be more appropriate for the next invitation to come from Great Britain.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I am an old-fashioned American. I believe in my country paddling its own canoe and attending to its own knitting and minding its own business, and I believe that if we proceed to develop our Navy with a true conception of what our needs are, without reference to the rest of the world, in the end we will make a sounder and more practical and effective contribution toward the peace of the world, than if we are continually endeavoring to bring the other peoples into conference, particularly at a time when their feeling toward us is really not of the most friendly kind. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FISH. Does not the gentleman realize that after this program for 15 battle cruisers goes into effect, which it practically has by its passage in the other body, we will have twenty-three 8-inch 10,000-ton cruisers, as opposed to the British 15, and those 23 in addition to our other cruisers will be equal in power approximately to the English 64 cruisers?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I do not so understand or see it in that way at all. As I see it, she will have 64 and we will have 33, after these 15 cruisers are built, not taking into account the cruisers she may see fit to build in the meanwhile. We will have 296,000 tons and she will have 409,000 tons.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman stated that we ought to pay attention to our own needs. We would not have need for any navy at all if no other nation had them. Our needs apparently are that other nations are building. If they had no navy we would only need a police force.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. We always need a navy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I ask for two minutes.

Mr. FRENCH. I will yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. The time has never come in the recent history of the world, certainly not in the history of this country, when we can forego the necessity, maybe the luxury, of a navy. [Applause.] And it seems to me we should resolve the necessities of our requirement in naval strength by a consideration of any possible eventualities in the world, and just so long as the world is as it is to-day the United States can not safely or properly, nor can we as guardians of the security of our country, lend ourselves to any procedure that would involve either a reduction of the strength of the United States Navy or a failure to keep it at proper strength, or at proper efficiency and ability to meet any need, by permitting it to run down so that we would have to rely on vessels that are out of date, outclassed, or which have become obsolete. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I do want to state my very great confidence in the American people and my confidence in their love of peace and my own very great desire for peace. We have never been a warlike country, we never will be a warlike country, and just because we may at some time be semi-prepared, partially prepared, it is said we will not wish to fight other countries. We have never fought for any save a just cause. We have never sought to acquire other lands through war. We have no predatory designs upon other countries. I have seen too much since 1917 of the horrors and ravages of war not to want this country, the youth of this country, the older men and women of this country, to be prepared to defend themselves in every possible way.

In my opinion if we had been prepared at the time of the World War, if we had been prepared at the time of the sinking of the Lusitania we would have entered that World War earlier and thereby saved untold suffering. It is my opinion that Russia would have remained with the Allies and that the war would have ended much sooner than it did, and we would have saved millions of lives and millions of dollars. Life is very dear to the people who are left behind. Life is very necessary often in value to the country.

In 1917, while abroad, talking with members of the French and British missions and the members of the foreign commissions sent to this country as to what lack of preparedness meant to the Allies, I learned how very near complete disaster came. I know that they felt the fear of complete disaster, because they could not produce rapidly enough the machinery of war and they needed more men. A Canadian officer said that when he saw our first men at Fort Myer preparing to go across to win the war for the world, tears of gratitude streamed down his face, believing in our strength and power to save the Allies.

I can not bear to think that this country is not intelligent enough to maintain preparedness. I know my pacifist friends are just as desirous of peace as I am and just as sincere in their convictions, only we do not agree as to the way by which we can maintain peace.

I am afraid to think that we are not as well prepared as we should be in ships and munitions. I want to make a statement to show how long it takes a manufacturing plant to make certain things necessary in making munitions and in making the other machinery of war.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Chairman, I am really representing the Connecticut Manufacturers' Association, as well as being a member of the committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

The Connecticut Manufacturers' Association has a membership of about 800 manufacturers, with about $750,000,000 invested in plants in Connecticut and western Massachusetts. They have been cooperating with the district ordnance chief on this preparedness program by having appointed a committee to consult with him, and the district chief is using this committee in a consulting capacity. We have been very much interested in the industrial preparedness work in our district. Connecticut manufacturers have asked me simply to report at this time their interest in the matter and their willingness to cooperate in every way possible.

The experience that we had in the war is more or less the same as that reported by Mr. Haynes yesterday. We were called upon in June, 1917, by General Rice to make antiaircraft gun carriages.

He looked around and inspected our plant and decided we were probably as well fitted as anyone in the country to make antiaircraft gun carriages, although we had had no experience in the manufacture of gun carriages.

This carriage was an intricate piece of machinery, which required precision work.

In June, 1917, General Rice gave us an order for fifty-one 75-millimeter antiaircraft gun carriages. The 75-millimeter simply referred to the gun. The gun was mounted on an American carriage of American design, with an American-designed recuperator and recoil mechanism. The recoil mechanisms that Mr. Haynes referred to yesterday were the French type, and his delay was on the French type of recuperator. The recuperators that we made were the American type, spring-recoil recuperators.

As I say, we were called on to make 51 of those carriages at first, and we made them practically by tool-room methods. We made those carriages by main strength, you might say, and we got them to France.

We had the contract in June, 1917, and we got the carriages all into France before the armistice.

We made those practically in the tool room. We did not have a chance to make them on a quantity-production basis.

The next contract that General Rice gave us was a contract for four hundred and ten 3-inch antiaircraft gun carriages, and that contract was given us in July, 1917, within a few weeks after the first one. That was a contract that we were supposed to make on a quantity-production basis. That is the gun carriage of which you have a photograph before you.

We started immediately to tool up for that job. The tooling element which was talked about so much yesterday was a very considerable factor in the manufacture of this carriage. We had to design and make over 4,000 tools, such as jigs and fixtures and gauges, in order to handle that job properly.

A great many of those tools and jigs and fixtures were made with bodies of steel or iron castings. Patterns had to be made for those.

The time involved in the engineering work and the design and manufacture of tools needed in a proposition of that kind, we know from experience, would make it impossible for us to make those carriages in a way to accomplish what is expected of us in the present preparedness program.

In the present preparedness program we are expected to make 6 carriages in the seventh month, 10 in the eighth month, 24 in the ninth month, and then 24 in each month thereafter.

If we should be called upon now and had no tools, it would be absolutely impossible for us to come through on that program.

That is what we manufacturers are all worried about. We are asked to assume a certain responsibility in case of war, and we know very well we can not come through under present conditions. It is absolutely impossible, unless we are given a chance prior to the zero hour to prepare ourselves.

Besides the tooling factor there is the factor that was brought out yesterday also, and that is the question of materials. On that gun carriage, and on the 75-millimeter gun carriage, we had great difficulty in getting steel castings. There are plenty of steel foundries in the country, but a job like that on the antiaircraft-gun carriage requires that the castings be very thin in sections and light. The physical qualities have to go up in proportion.

There were no foundries at that time, and I do not think there are now, that are making castings of the physical characteristics required for most of the ordnance specifications. We looked all over the country, and we went through foundry after foundry, but we could not meet the specifications.

Finally we found a little foundry near our home plant at New Britain, Conn., with a small electric furnace, where we were able to make the castings of the physical and chemical requirements necessary to make those carriages.

In order to get the castings that were needed we combined with the Hartford Electric Light Co., of Hartford, Conn., and increased the size of that foundry. We spent several hundred thousand dollars, with the cooperation of the Hartford Electric Light Co., to increase the capacity of that foundry. We were able then, after we had trained the men—the molders—to make castings with this very thin section, to get out that work.

It took months to train those men, and it was done at great expense. We finally used green sand molds, and we made a pretty good job.

This may be a diversion, but it is interesting. That foundry which we built was operated for a few months, and then the armistice came and we tried to continue its operation. But there was no demand for castings of that character in that part of the country. It was found impossible to compete with the open-hearth steel foundries and foundries in other parts of the country that could furnish commercial castings.

The result is that that foundry has been idle for eight or nine years. The entire investment put into the foundry by the Hartford Electric Light Co. and ourselves has been lost. The New Britain Machine Co. was never repaid.

There are instances of that kind all through the manufacturing districts, where, instead of making money on the war contracts, they have actually sustained losses.

Take, for instance, our own company, the New Britain Machine Co., as an illustration. We spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in increasing our plant and increasing our facilities in order to take care of this contract for gun carriages. It hurt us so badly that we have not paid a dividend since 1919, until December 31, 1928; and then we paid only a small one. It has taken us practically 10 years to rehabilitate our finances and put our business in the condition in which it was when we undertook these war contracts.

I am simply giving that as an illustration of the fact that Government work is not considered desirable, and at the present time the manufacturers in Connecticut do not want Government work for the sake of the work. They do not want it; it is foreign to their commercial activities. They do not want it also because it always costs them money.

Now, to return to the main theme I was discussing, if we had had an educational order, and particularly the opportunity to make tools and to study the technical problems involved in the manufacture of gun carriages, we would have been able to cut down the time of delivery by a great many months.

Our experience in making the recoil mechanism was similar to that of Mr. Haynes. We had a lot to learn. It was of the American design and we ran into difficulties in forging materials, as he did, and we ran into difficulties of finish and accuracy requirements, as he did, all of which could have been studied in advance and preparations could have been made for that work.

Educational orders placed in private factories at stated times in small amounts, not large enough to be of any great value to the manufacturing plants, would teach these manufacturing plants what to make and how to make it. If they are not placed, the private manufacturing plants of the country will not know how to make these things necessary in the production of munitions and things that go to make up the machinery of war.

I just want to say one thing, that this bill is not in any way a draft measure. I think one or two people have had an idea in some way we were drafting these companies to manufacture. It is not a draft measure in any way.

I have always been very much interested, of course, since 1917, having seen so much suffering as a result of the lack of preparedness in France. I saw the Vaterland, an interned German ship, creeping out of New York Harbor on New Year's Day in 1918 and, later on, found the Vaterland had to make four starts before she got under way because the engines had been tampered with by the German crew. If we had had a good enough merchant marine of our own, we would not have had to use German ships.

Also, I found out in France we did not have a single airplane in 1917 and we did not use one of our own airplanes during the war. I heard men say constantly, "We are not prepared to fight." We could not have been prepared to fight; we did not have enough of anything in the beginning.

A fighting army expends ammunition each day of warfare. The supply must come from factories or reserve stocks. This ammunition is not commercial and the factories are not regular peace-time producers. During the time their production is being built up reserve stocks must be available to be drawn upon. The longer it takes to build up the necessary production the greater the initial reserve must be. The alternative of a slackened rate of fire means a greatly increased death rate and possible defeat. The British Army experienced the former in averting defeat in Flanders while waiting for high-explosive shell production, and barely avoided defeat even with the enormous loss of men accepted.

I have a statement here from the War Department which shows that the British Army experienced reverses because they did not have reserve stocks.

Of course, they had been manufacturing for a long time before the war. This bill has the indorsement, you know, of the Secretary of War and the approval of the Director of the Budget, and it is certainly in keeping with the economy program.

I think it will take no work away from the arsenals and I know the people who have arsenals in their districts are particularly anxious to have the arsenals kept up and, after discussing the matter with the War Department, I realize they are equally anxious to have the arsenals kept going. I think Judge Ives need have no fear that the arsenals will lose work by this bill.

I do not want to take up any more of your time, but I would like very much to file some papers and would like very much to file a preliminary report which was written by Gen. Guy E. Tripp, the chairman of the National Association of Manufacturers Committee on Industrial Preparedness, who is the president of the Western Electric Co.

PRELIMINARY REPORT NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL PREPAREDNESS

FINDINGS

1. Continued prosperity in America is dependent upon assurance of enduring peace.

2. America's most recent experience indicates that the surest guaranty of peace is a readiness to defend the national sovereignty, i. e., preparedness.

3. The foreign policy of America involves no dreams of conquest nor any aggressive action toward any foreign power whatsoever, and therefore preparedness in America connotes only defensive measures.

4. America maintains, in proportion to national wealth guarded, the smallest standing army of any of the 50 principal countries of the world. In proportion to population, whose peace and prosperity are at stake, America likewise maintains the smallest Regular Army, even smaller than that allowed Germany by the treaty of Versailles, which was specifically intended to render her impotent as a military power.

5. Preparedness on an efficient and economical basis requires years for complete achievement and unremitting attention for its proper maintenance. Hastily improvised preparedness is needlessly wasteful to human life and unnecessarily expensive.

6. Unpreparedness has failed dismally in ever keeping America out of war. Proper preparedness, however, according to the best military opinion, might conceivably have precluded the necessity for American participation in the World War, and, in any event, would have shortened the duration of the conflict, which cost a million dollars an hour for over two years.

7. Prior to the World War preparedness was taken to mean only plans for the mobilization of man power, failing to take into consideration the fact that mobilized man power, unless adequately supported by munition power, was entirely ineffective.

8. The great demonstrated lesson of the World War was the fact that America, relying solely on her own resources, could organize and train troops at a rate which far exceeded the capacity of the country to arm and equip them; further, that the rate of manufacture of noncommercial articles of ordnance was the controlling factor of the entire war program.

9. Practically all the knowledge needed to organize and employ an expanded army is automatically maintained by the peace-time activities of the country with the all-important exception that (a) knowledge of the use of arms, and (b) knowledge of the manufacture of arms, must be stimulated in times of peace in order to be available adequately and promptly in event of emergency.

10. It is contrary to the traditional policy of America to maintain an extensive civilian industry devoted primarily to the manufacture of ordnance, and it is improbable that America will ever look with favor on measures intended to encourage the growth of a civilian industry dependent upon the manufacture of war material for its profits and existence.

11. Under existing conditions, the Ordnance Department of the Army, for example, while possibly adequate for such development work and such production in restricted quantities as may be necessary during peace times, is deficient in commissioned personnel when considered as the nucleus of knowledge around which must be built the tremendous industrial machine which, in the event of war, requires a preponderant proportion of the entire industrial war effort.

12. Commissioned officers of the Army appear to be available to the number of 1,700 devoted exclusively to mobilizing man power or problems involved in the use of arms, whereas but 24 have to date been assigned to the far greater and more difficult task of educating industry in the manufacture of arms.

13. The present program for national defense is, therefore, out of balance to a critical degree, due to the wide disparity in the attention now being devoted to problems involving mobilization of man power, as contrasted with the attention being devoted to problems involving the mobilization of munition power—particularly in the noncommercial classes such as ordnance and aviation material.

14. Due to the wise recommendations of the Morrow Board now being carried into effect by appropriate legislation, the problem of aviation material is proceeding toward ultimate solution, while leaving the problem of securing ordnance material as the crucial question in considering national defense to-day.

15. What America needs most at present is a greater knowledge of ordnance manufacture, and all artificial obstacles to the acquirement of this knowledge by American industry should be removed forthwith and every effort made through legislative enactment to stimulate the acquirement of this vital knowledge.

16. In this connection attention is invited to the fact that in order to build up the American aircraft industry for purposes of national defense, the Morrow Board states, on page 29 of their report, as follows:

"We recommended that: * * *

"(4) Government competition with the civil industry in production activity be eliminated except in those projects impractical of realization by the civil industry * * *."

This wise recommendation has been adopted as the permanent policy of the War Department. It will obviously tend to spread to the commercial world a knowledge on the design and manufacture of airplane material and render the solution of the aircraft problem immeasurably easier. The same reasoning should apply to the ordnance problem.

17. The present plans for the War Department for mobilizing industry for the production of ordnance in the event of emergency are excellent in every particular, and if carried through to conclusion in all particulars will not only shorten the duration, and therefore the cost of a possible future conflict, but by strengthening our defenses will actually make the possibility of America being involved in war more and more remote in direct ratio with their degree of completeness.

18. Of the elements of industrial mobilization, the determination of requirements, both as to quantities and dates wanted, and the preliminary allocation of requirements to existing facilities, have been completed in a most effective manner. The actual completion of emergency production plans by ordnance reserve plants with the degree of accuracy and detail necessary to permit them to be used as the basis of determining probable schedule of output, as well as secondary requirements for buildings, equipment, raw material, etc., is a task of considerable magnitude for each factory involved.

19. Existing obstacles to the completion of emergency production plans are due largely to the scarcity of trained ordnance officers available for assignment to specific plants to supply necessary technical data and otherwise assist manufacturers in this exacting work which is expected to be done without direct remuneration from the Government.

20. The ordance problem is the crux of national defense to-day, inasmuch as our citizens can be called to the colors ever so smoothly, can be housed and clothed and fed ever so completely, can be paid ever so generously, and furnished with all the care that surgical, medical, and dental science can afford, and yet will not become soldiers until they are furnished with the tools of their trade, viz, ordnance.

21. Ordnance is, of course, but one of several essentials of a modern army, but all the others are present in adequate supply or can be obtained in much less time than that required for the production of ordnance which, therefore, becomes the controlling factor of the entire program for national defense.

RECOMMENDATIONS

In order to provide a greater reservoir of knowledge for the solution of problems involved in the mobilization of munition power, particularly the noncommercial phase thereof such as the manufacture of ordnance, the committee on industrial preparedness of the National Association of Manufacturers recommends:

(1) That the National Association of Manufacturers indorse the organization of the proposed "Munitions battalion" as described by the Hon. Hanford MacNider, the Assistant Secretary of War, at the annual meeting of the association held in New York City on October 7, 1926; that the necessary appropriation of Federal funds for the purpose of training annually 400 college students, who have satisfactorily completed at least three years of their courses, in the elements of military science and tactics, and in addition in the basic procurement problems of the Army, be urged upon the Congress now in session; that, due to the need for immediate action in the premises, Hon. Frank A. Scott, during the war chairman of the War Industries Board, be requested, subject to the approval by your board of directors, to present to the President of the United States the recommendations of the association in this connection.

(2) That the Ordnance Department of the United States Army be progressively increased over a period of years, in order to provide personnel of a proper degree of permanency equipped with the vitally important knowledge of the design and manufacture of ordnance necessary to permit present plans for industrial preparedness to be carried to a successful conclusion.

(3) That the provisions of section 5a of the national defense act, approved June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920, to the effect that "He (the Assistant Secretary of War) shall cause to be manufactured or produced at the Government arsenals or Government-owned factories of the United States, all such supplies or articles needed by the War Department as said arsenals or Government-owned factories are capable of manufacturing or producing upon an economical basis," be rescinded and that legislation be secured permitting the placing of "educational orders" with commercial manufacturers for the production of noncommercial articles of ordnance with due consideration for knowledge of the art acquired rather than as at present, upon a competitive basis as to price.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ORDNANCE,
Washington, January 24, 1927.

Memorandum for Mrs. ROGERS.

Subject: State of preparedness as to munitions at outbreak of the World War and, in brief, conditions to-day.

Rifles: In April, 1917, we had on hand 600,000 Springfield rifles, sufficient to equip an army of approximately 1,000,000 men. The only places where these rifles were made were Springfield Armory, capacity 1,000 per day, and Rock Island Arsenal, capacity 500 per day. We needed approximately 3,000,000 rifles at once. Had it not been that six large manufacturing establishments were making rifles for foreign governments and that this same machinery could be used to make the same rifles converted to our own ammunition, we would have been in a very bad condition as regards rifles at the outbreak of the World War. We now have on hand a sufficient reserve of rifles left over from the last war so that it is estimated that Springfield Armory can maintain these rifles in satisfactory condition for almost any future emergency that may arise.

Rifle ammunition: At the outbreak of the war in 1917 we had on hand approximately 200,000,000 rounds of rifle ammunition. The requirements called for almost 3,000,000,000 rounds to July 1, 1918, and almost 3,000,000,000 rounds to December 31, 1918. Had it not been for the facts that, due to the Allies holding the lines we did not have to get our troops into the line of battle very early, and that our small-arms ammunition companies had already installed machinery and were making large quantities of rifle ammunition for the Allies, we would have been in very bad condition as to rifle ammunition during the early days of the World War. We fear that we may be in some such unsatisfactory condition for the next war, because our cartridge companies have largely scrapped their machinery for ammunition manufacture, except in small quantities which they need for making sporting ammunition, and we are now using a cartridge different from that which we used and which was manufactured during the World War. We therefore deem it highly desirable that we shall have a small quantity of the ammunition which we need in peace time made by each of these cartridge companies in order to insure that they shall be in better condition, both as regards equipment and knowledge, to take up quantity production on the outbreak of war.

Artillery: At the outbreak of the World War we had on hand some 500 American 3-inch field guns. We needed many thousands of these guns, and the manufacturing capacity in this country was extremely limited. It was decided to adopt the French 75-millimeter gun because France had an excess of these guns and could supply us quickly, and because the ammunition problem would be simplified if all the Allies used the same type of shell. We would have been in very sore straits as regards artillery had not the French helped us out. We have now on hand about 5,000 75-millimeter guns, which will supply requirements for the first seven months of a major emergency. The total requirement for this gun is approximately 11,000 in two years. None of these guns has been manufactured since the war, except a few experimental designs, and the art of manufacture is being largely lost. Our arsenals have not sufficient capacity to make the gun as fast as we will require it. It is highly desirable, therefore, that the commercial companies to which we have allocated war orders for these guns be given small educational orders from time to time in order that they can tool up for them and become experienced in this line of manufacture.

Artillery ammunition: At the outbreak of the World War there were very limited existing stocks of artillery ammunition. However, when we adopted the French 75-millimeter gun as a standard our own shortages in ammunition were made up by surplus which the Allies had on hand in France. At the present time we are favored by reserves of approximately 3,700,000 rounds of 75-millimeter high-explosive shell, which is only sufficient, however, to equip the overseas possessions and to meet the requirements of our armies for less than three months. No ammunition of this type has been manufactured in quantity since the war. The maximum requirements for a war of major effort would be about 3,800,000 rounds per month. Picatinny Arsenal and Frankford Arsenal are the only Government plants for making and loading artillery ammunition. They could be expanded to approximately 25,000 rounds per month within a few months after declaration of war. Commercial sources must therefore be relied upon for the great bulk of production, and in order that these commercial sources can get into production quickly it is highly desirable that all firms to which we have allocated orders for production in case of war be given educational orders so that they can install a small line of machinery and become skilled in the operations of making this ammunition.

The above are only a few examples, but they suffice to show, in brief, the condition of unpreparedness at the beginning of the war; the fact that this unpreparedness did not result most disastrously for us was only because our allies were able to help us out, and because we did not have to enter the firing line at once, and because our own manufacturers at that time had much previous experience and had installed much machinery by reason of making munitions under contract for the Allies.

TOWNSEND WHELEN.

I can not understand how anyone can feel that by placing educational orders we are getting ready for war. You are simply teaching the people of America to protect themselves. Mothers and fathers teach their children their A, B, C's, teach them to read and write. You want to teach the children to take care of their lives and to take care of their country and defend their country. These educational orders will simply teach industries their A, B, C's of preparedness. [Applause.] Once more I want to express my admiration for the people of America for not being a warlike people and my faith in American ideals and American honor. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I trust that what I shall have to say will not be construed as either a wet or dry speech, but simply an effort to bring about a more efficient administration by the officers in charge of the Coast Guard of the Great Lakes district and also to create a condition that will improve the standing of that branch of the service.

Some time ago my colleague [Mr. DEMPSEY] and myself brought to the attention of the House the horrible shooting of Mr. Hanson, of Niagara Falls, by two Coast Guard men on Lewiston Hill. Since that time the case has been brought to trial in the Federal court at Elmira, N. Y. The jury in the case of the two Coast Guard officers indicted at Niagara Falls for this fatal shooting of Jacob D. Hanson disagreed, leaving the case where it was at the start, so far as redress for the brutal murder of this splendid citizen is concerned. However, the procedure just concluded at Elmira has a feature which signally contributes both to definition of the law and the safety of the citizen, in the rulings of the presiding judge.

In his charge to the jury Judge Hazel upheld as a fundamental principle of law the necessity of diligent heed for protection of life when Coast Guard officers are seeking to make an arrest. The court also states most emphatically that suspicion is no excuse for shooting.

The judge's statement, in part, is as follows:

If an officer—and this applies to a Coast Guard man on duty—seeks to arrest a person without a warrant he must use great care and caution not to injure the person whom he is seeking to apprehend. He has no right to shoot a person where one fails to stop his car on request when the occupant is merely suspected of violating the Volstead Act. Violations of the national prohibition act by the transportation of liquor, its sale, or its possession, are misdemeanors and not felonies.

Notwithstanding the admonition, the jury, a majority of whom voted for a verdict of guilty, was deadlocked, confused, perhaps, by the defense of the guardsman by the Federal attorney, who brought all the power and influence of his position to their aid. Nevertheless, we find in the charge from the bench a militant admonition to all Federal officers to exercise the utmost care and caution and an equally vigorous affirmation of the right of the citizen to enjoy personal security.

If the law, as defined by Judge Hazel, had been respected at the time of the Hanson tragedy there would have been no tragedy and instead of suffering his agonizing death Hanson would be alive to-day.

Strengthening the definition of the judge, I find no excuse for this terrible crime in the orders issued by the Commissioner of Prohibition Enforcement, Doctor Doran, from which I quote:

Section 25 of regulations No. 4, a manual of instructions for officers and agents in the field, reads as follows:

"The promiscuous flourishing and display of firearms is prohibited. A weapon should never be drawn on a person except in self-defense, or to prevent the commission of a felony (a misdemeanor). The unwise and unwarranted use of firearms by officers in the past has caused the bureau considerable embarrassment and resulted in much unfavorable and harmful publicity. While it is not intended that an officer should remain passive and jeopardize his own life or the life of an associate when danger threatens, it is intended that extreme caution and cool deliberation should control his actions. An officer should remember that he will be held strictly accountable and personally responsible for the fatal result of any use of firearms by him."

Nor can any grounds for defense of the shooting of Mr. Hanson be found in the enforcement provisions issued by the Treasury Department to Coast Guard and customs officers. I read:

PART 5.—ENFORCEMENT PROVISIONS

SEC. 581. Boarding vessels: Officers of the customs or of the Coast Guard, and agents or other persons authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury, or appointed for that purpose in writing by a collector, may at any time go on board of any vessel or vehicle at any place in the United States or within 4 leagues of the coast of the United States, without as well as within their respective districts, to examine the manifest and to inspect, search, and examine the vessel or vehicle, and every part thereof, and any person, trunk, or package on board, and to this end to hail and stop such vessel or vehicle, if under way, and use all necessary force to compel compliance; and if it shall appear that any breach or violation of the laws of the United States has been committed, whereby or in consequence of which such vessel or vehicle, or the merchandise, or any part thereof, on board of or imported by such vessel or vehicle is liable to forfeiture, it shall be the duty of such officer to make seizure of the same and to arrest, or, in case of escape or attempted escape, to pursue and arrest any person engaged in such breach or violation.

Officers of the Department of Commerce and other persons authorized by such department may go on board of any vessel at any place in the United States or within 4 leagues of the coast of the United States and hail, stop, and board such vessel in the enforcement of the navigation laws and arrest or, in case of escape or attempted escape, pursue and arrest any person engaged in the breach or violation of the navigation laws.

More specific, and with a far greater degree of caution, is the statement accredited to Captain Chiswell, of the Coast Guard, which I quote:

COAST GUARD ORDERS CITED

"Commanders of Coast Guard patrol vessels," said Captain Chiswell, "have definite instructions regarding treatment of yachts and pleasure craft. Every summer we send to these men copies of our order. We realize they have a tremendous task in catching the rum runners, who are not above imitating pleasure craft to evade the law. The Coast Guard orders follow:

"With the coming of summer, a large number of yachts and other pleasure craft will be operating in coastal waters. In the light of our experience with the methods of those engaged in liquor smuggling, it is deemed highly improbable that many, if any, yachts or other bona fide pleasure craft smuggle liquor ashore from vessels of the fleet. A further consideration is the fact that it is highly important that the Coast Guard retain the good will and have the helpful cooperation of law-abiding citizens who use pleasure craft so extensively in the summer.

CAUTIONED ABOUT PLEASURE CRAFT

"Accordingly, it is directed that vessels which may be plainly recognized as yachts or as craft used solely for pleasure be not stopped, boarded, or searched for the purpose of ascertaining if they are smuggling liquor unless they be found communicating with or hovering about rum ships, or unless other particularly suspicious circumstances require that they be stopped, boarded, and searched."

Nowhere, no place, in any of these official orders can there be found the slightest justification for this brutal murder of an innocent citizen who was shot to death while violating no law.

That the Hanson case has not served as a deterrent but has actually accentuated the promiscuous use of firearms is proven by the conduct of the Coast Guard officers operating in the Niagara district.

On the night of July 8 the Ticker, a 32-foot cabin cruiser, sailing in American waters en route to a picnic at Lake View, which is a short distance from Buffalo, was fired upon five times by Coast Guard officers. On board the yacht at the time of the shooting were Clarence Pistell, vice president of the Pistell Deans Co., William T. Jebb, jr., vice president of the Associated Advertising Industries, and a party of friends. The boat is owned jointly by Jebb, Pistell, and Raichle; the latter, it appears, is a law partner of Colonel Donovan.

I quote a letter:

On July 11 a hearing was held in Commander Wolfe's office of the Coast Guard. Elliott Burch, boatswain of the C–209, the Government boat, was examined by Raichle at this hearing. During the cross-examination he admitted that he fired without investigation as to whether the Ticker was a rum runner or not. He admitted he fired five times on the boat, and then admitted no liquor was found on board after examination.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MEAD. May I have three minutes more?

Mr. AYRES. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. MEAD. I desire to further explain the reason for injecting into this discussion the department orders with regard to the boarding and searching of vessels.

On Thursday, November 29, Coast Guard men fired upon the motor boat Bug, killing Carl Anderson, of Lewiston, and very seriously wounding Edmond Sohr, of Niagara Falls. While these men are alleged to have been known to the officers as violators of the prohibition laws, no liquor was found on the boat after the fatal shooting took place.

The Buffalo Evening News, a supporter of the administration and the prohibition laws, has this to say of the shooting of the Bug, as well as other cases of a similar nature:

[From the Buffalo Evening News, Wednesday, July 11, 1928]

GUN PLAY ON THE LAKES

The officers and crews of the Coast Guard boats must realize that the first time any of their scare shots or command shots hit a boat, they will bring against themselves personally and the service generally the same public outcry that arose when a citizen of Niagara Falls was shot on Lewiston Hill. It matters not whether the firing is on land or on water. There is no legitimate police power under civil law to fire merely on suspicion that somebody may be violating a law or to enforce a command. That is a right which exists only in a zone where martial law has been proclaimed. No such declaration of martial law has been made either on water or land along this border. When inquiries are made of higher officials, the information invariably given to the public is that orders permit shooting only under the ordinary conditions that apply to civil officers. There can be no such thing as secret martial law that gives authority to police but no warning to citizens.

If the excuse is offered that shots are not intended to hit, that only becomes a confession of the futility of such police methods. Miscellaneous scare shooting must serve more often to warn real rum runners to get back across the boundary and await a more favorable opportunity than to interfere seriously with the illicit trade. Whether that is the effect or not, this kind of gun play makes the Coast Guard boats a danger to business and pleasure craft and to one another that is entirely unjustified by the services rendered. It should be stopped before any more tragedies occur.

INVESTIGATION IN ORDER

Firing on a motor boat that did not carry lights and that refused to obey the command to heave to, the crew of a Coast Guard vessel operating on Lake Ontario killed one man and wounded another early Thursday morning. Papers found on the body of the dead man indicated that he had been running liquor from Canada, but at the time of the shooting there was no liquor aboard the craft.

"The law plainly states," says the officer in command of the patrol detail, "that the Coast Guard has the right to stop, search, and examine any vessel in American waters and to use all force necessary to compel compliance. The men of the C. G. 2364 were perfectly within their rights."

No doubt they were. Yet there is no good reason why they should not be called upon to justify themselves before the duly constituted authorities. Their action should not be accepted as a matter of course. The formalities of investigation should be carefully observed with respect to this shooting and all others for which they may be responsible. Otherwise the Coast Guard men are likely to disregard ordinary human rights. Always they should be held to strict accountability.

Similar editorial comment appeared in the Buffalo Times, the Buffalo Courier-Express, and other publications in the Niagara frontier district.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. MEAD. I believe the reason for this utter disregard of the law, as well as the orders of the department and the rights of our citizens, can be charged to the carelessness and maladministration of the affairs of the Coast Guard on the part of the officers in charge of the Buffalo district. Their removal, and replacement by officers with a higher regard for the rights of the people would, in my judgment, increase respect for law and result in better enforcement. Let me cite a case that was brought to my attention recently by the judge of the municipal court at Dunkirk, N. Y. It involves two members of the Coast Guard who, in company with several women, became embroiled in a drunken fight and, as a consequence, were arrested by the chief of police of the city of Dunkirk.

I quote the following from Judge Johnson's letter:

So disorderly was this party that it came to the attention of the chief of police, who ordered these men from the place and told them to go back to their ship. They started for the ship, evidently, but secured more liquor on the way and got into a disorderly fist fight. The only excuse that was given was that one of the guardsmen thought he was fighting with a civilian.

It might be of interest to you to know that the local Coast Guard recently fired on a fish tug and have announced their intention of searching all fish tugs at this port. Surely they do not believe these fish tugs are transporting liquor, because if they did they would not be so foolish as to warn them through the press that they were going to be searched.

This looks to me like a little spite work.

In conclusion the letter states:

I have been informed that on the night the Coast Guard men were sentenced fourteen 1-pound shots were fired from near the docks in the direction of our water front.

This promiscuous firing was not intended as a salute to the judge, but perhaps was prompted by a spirt of resentment by Coast Guard men who took exception to the show of courage on the part of the chief of police and the judge who dared to enforce the law so flagrantly violated by the guardsmen.

These men were sentenced to six months' imprisonment for violating the very law they were sworn to enforce.

I have here an article headed "Coast Guards accused of firing on tug in Lake Erie while drunk." This case was brought to the attention of the House by Representative CHALMERS, of Ohio:

[From the Washington Daily News, Saturday, December 8]

COAST GUARDS ACCUSED OF FIRING ON TUG IN LAKE ERIE WHILE DRUNK

Court-martial and naval-prison terms awaits the crew of a Lake Erie Coast Guard patrol boat if charges of drunkenness and misconduct made against them by R. E. Mills, manager of the Toledo Fish Co., are shown to be accurate, according to Rear Admiral Frederick C. Billard, commandant of the Coast Guard.

Billard has ordered Commander Martin Rasmussen, of Buffalo, to go to Toledo at once to investigate charges by Mills that one of his fishing tugs had been twice fired on November 24.

Billard was advised of the charges by Representative CHALMERS, of Toledo, who received a letter from Mills saying the Coast Guard men had fired on his tug without provocation or warning; that they staggered drunkenly about and that one of the crew was so drunk he actually fell into the lake.

Let me say to you, my friends, whether you advocate the Volstead law or favor its modification, as I do, the definition of the law as given by Federal Judge Hazel in the Hanson case, and the orders issued by the department itself are ample and warrant, in my judgment, an investigation by Congress of the enforcement conditions on the Great Lakes and the removal from the service of the chief administrative officer there who, it occurs to me, serves not to increase the glorious traditions of the Coast Guard but to bring them into disgrace and disrepute. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. TILSON having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. LUCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16714) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADDRESS OF GEORGE E. ROBERTS ON FARM RELIEF

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech made by Mr. George Roberts, vice president of the National City Bank, on farm relief.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered by Mr. Roberts on farm relief. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this speech in favor of farm relief or against it?

Mr. FISH. Well, it is a general discussion of the whole matter.

Mr. SCHAFER. From a banker's standpoint and not from a farmer's standpoint?

Mr. FISH. Yes; but he is a farmer from Iowa. I think it is educational.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a speech delivered in a discussion of "Farm Relief," at the National Republican Club, New York, January 19, 1929, by George E. Roberts, vice president of the National City Bank of New York. Senator BROOKHART, of Iowa, Representative DICKINSON, of Iowa, and Representative MCFADDEN, of Pennsylvania, were participants in the discussion. Mr. Roberts's speech is as follows:

I am in a rather unusual position here to-day. I am, as you have been told, a native Iowan, and although I have strayed some distance from the edge of the prairie, my affection for the old State is as deep as ever it was, and I believe I have as genuine an interest in the welfare of its people as any resident can have. I do not think there is any conflict of interest between the West and the East. The industries of both sections are parts of one organization, serving the entire country.

My business is in Wall Street, but everybody in Wall Street has come from somewhere else and many have come from the Middle West and many from the farms. I think nearly all have sense enough to know that the prosperity of New York City and of the industries, the corporations, and the varied interests of this eastern section are dependent upon prosperity throughout the great interior. If I oppose the views and proposals of these highly accredited representatives of Iowa, Senator BROOKHART and Congressman DICKINSON, I assure you it is not because I am indifferent to the losses and the distress which many people in that region have been suffering, but solely because I differ with these gentlemen as to the practical results of the policies which they advocate.

I think I know something of farm conditions. My father was a pioneer in the Territory of Iowa. He was a native of New York State, born in the city of Utica in 1823. When he grew up to about 20 years of age and looked about to see what he was going to do for a living, it seemed to him that there was no longer much of a chance for a young man in the State of New York. The country was all settled up, there was as much talk of unemployment and of business being overdone as there is now, and a lot of talk about the developing West and the opportunities there for young men, and his attention was fixed on the Territory of Iowa. He determined to go to the Territory of Iowa, and you will be interested to know the route that he selected to reach there. An older brother kept a diary, and not long ago I obtained a copy of a portion of it, including this entry:

"1843, December 7: David Roberts, brother, started for New Orleans by sailing vessel from New York. Loaned him $10."

I know from my father direct that he was headed for Iowa, that he came down to New York City on a canal boat, took a sailing vessel to New Orleans, and went up the Mississippi on a steamboat. And that is only one generation back, if you allow that I belong to the present generation.

About the time my father was migrating to Iowa a family in which was a young daughter was traveling overland by the now historic covered wagon from the State of Maine to the same destination. These young people met and were married, and I have always thought that their migration and marriage and the founding of their home was typical of the settlement of the West.

I was born in the country back of Dubuque, but while I was still a boy my parents moved farther west to Fort Dodge, county of Webster, in what is now the tenth congressional district, a district of 14 counties of as fertile farming land as lies out of doors, now for many years ably represented in Congress by my honored friend, Congressman DICKINSON. I lived in that district from boyhood until I was 40 years old, and perhaps it is not out of place to say in this Republican Club that I had the honor of being chairman of the Republican district committee of that district for 14 years, beginning in 1888. What is more to the point to-day is that I have owned farms in that district since soon after I was 21 years old.

One of my earliest speculations, or to use a preferred term, "investments," was the purchase of about 1,000 acres of wild land at $3.50 per acre, and while I do not own that same land to-day, I have sold and bought from time to time, without, on the whole, materially reducing my aggregate holdings to this day. I have about that acreage in Mr. DICKINSON'S home county now.

Everbody dabbled in land out there in those days. It was about the only form of investment we knew about. I have sometimes said that I doubted if I would sleep well nights if I did not own some land, although I know that a good many people have been unable to sleep because they did own land.

When my children gather in solemn and reverent assembly to listen to the reading of my last will and testament, one of the questions they are going to ask each other is "Why in the world do you think he held on to those Iowa lands so long?"

If the Senator and Congressman were to put me on the stand I would have to admit that the annual returns have not been large. In fact, about the only benefit I have had from them in recent years has been when I have come to make up my income returns.

However, first and last, Iowa lands don't owe me anything, and I am free to say that the kind of farming that is done under absentee ownership is not entitled to any more returns than it gets. That kind of farming is in the class of improvements with which we are familiar in New York City, which are put on land to help pay the carrying charges while the land increases in value; "taxpayers" we call them.

This personal experience simply leads up to the first point I want to make in this discussion, which is to call your attention to the important part which land hunger and the tendency to rising land values always have played not only in the expansion of agriculture but in the current returns from farming operations. The relative compensation in any occupation depends upon the number of persons who choose to follow it, and the number that will crowd into any occupation is determined not alone by the nominal wage or reward, but by the sum total of all the gains, perquisites, advantages, and inducements of every kind, that are expected. The opportunity to become the owners of land which was expected to increase in value, and which would serve as a permanent home and means of livelihood, and which could be passed on to the children, has been the master motive to land settlement.

These inducements, and not any conspiracy or discrimination against agriculture, or any bias in the economic law, furnish the true explanation of the low current returns which agriculture usually has had in comparison with other industries throughout most of the past.

It is useless to discuss the compensation of farming without taking account of all the considerations which are a factor in deciding people to be farmers. There is a security and independence in the ownership of a farm which counts in the choice of farm life, just as the security and certainty of a Government bond, and the preference which many people give to it over other investments is a factor in the low returns from it.

I remember when the Territory which is now the State of Oklahoma was open to settlement. I will read a few sentences from the Encyclopedia Americana descriptive of that event:

"On March 23, 1889, President Harrison, under the authority of an act of Congress approved March 2, issued a proclamation declaring these unoccupied lands would be opened to settlement under the homestead laws of the United States at noon, April 22. Troops along the border kept the home seekers in order until that time, when the great crowd that had gathered dashed across the line in a mad race for the best lands and town lots. The entire region was settled almost within a day. Towns were laid out, farms opened up, and the population increased at an extraordinary rate."

The point I make is that the rush for these lands was not induced solely, or even primarily, by the returns from farming operations at the time, which, in fact, were low, but the settlement of those lands and the increased production of the staple crops which resulted had a direct effect upon the market prices of those products, and an effect beyond the influence of any legislation that might be passed.

I have told you that about the time of this Oklahoma opening I was somewhat active in politics, and my memory of political events is clear. The Republican Party of Iowa was in trouble. A Republican legislature had passed a prohibitory liquor law and you know something of the trouble that the liquor question can make in politics. We had a formidable bolt from the party, and the Democrats nominated one of the bolters, a prominent lawyer, Horace Boies, for governor, and, much to our confusion, he was elected.

That caused a sensation. Down here in New York at that time there was a Democratic organization known as the Reform Club. It was not Tammany, nor an organization to reform Tammany; it was devoted to tariff reform and Grover Cleveland. The Reform Club was greatly stirred by the news that the Democrats had carried Iowa. Here, they thought, is the long-expected revolt of the farmers against the protective tariff, and they proceeded to have a banquet and to invite Governor-elect Boies as the guest of honor. He came and was assigned the toast, "Our New Allies in the Northwest." Think of that, nearly 40 years ago! What a story of hope deferred it carries! He devoted his speech mainly to an account of hard times among the farmers of Iowa. I remember it very well, and I have been hearing so much just like it recently that I thought I would dig up that speech. I found that the Reform Club had faded into history—died with hopes unrealized—but a report of the speech was found in a file of the New York World, and I have had a copy made. I can not spare time for much, but listen to a little of it:

"Statistics show that the average wages of able-bodied men upon the farms of Iowa are $18.50 per month, or about 70 cents per day, and board, the lowest price paid any class of like laborers in the State, and yet out of 900 farmers reporting to our commission of labor statistics during the present year, more than 800 claim that this help at this wage has been employed at a loss instead of a profit during much of the five years last past.

"Out of the same number an equal portion assert that the actual cost of producing this cereal (corn), the most profitable of all that are raised within that State, has, during the same period, exceeded the entire value of the crop when harvested, saying nothing whatever of income from the capital invested in the land required to produce it.

"It is estimated by those making the reports that the cost of producing an acre of corn ready for market is $8; that the average crop for five years has been 33⅓ bushels; and statistics show that the average price of this corn in our local markets, soon after harvest, during such period has been 22 cents per bushel, making the entire value of the crop, when marketed, $7.33, or 67 cents less than the actual cost of production at market rates of labor.

"What is true of the production of corn in Iowa is equally true of all the great staples raised on her farms. When we consider the immense capital invested in the farms of a single State and are told that for five whole years it has not paid enough to compensate the labor employed, it is apparent that no other business in this country could have withstood such a condition of adversity during so prolonged a period, and it is equally certain had it been practicable for the farmers of the country to withdraw their capital from this line of industry, their number would have been greatly reduced, even in the best of the agricultural States." * * *

Doesn't that sound familiar, although 38 years old?

Now, I think you will be interested to know the course of land values since that time. I have here Bulletin 874 of the Department of Agriculture, published in 1920, in which are given figures for the average value per acre of all improved farming land in the State of Iowa over a period of years. For the year 1890, the year of the Boies speech, this average value was $28.14. The decade from 1890 to 1900 unquestionably was a period of hard times. It was the William Jennings Bryan period. He was nominated for the Presidency in 1896 and again in 1900 on the platform which proclaimed a state of distress, and that a law must be passed to cure it. Nevertheless, the census of 1900 showed that the average value of these lands had increased from $28.13 to $43.31 per acre. The next census was taken in 1910, when the average value was found to be $96 per acre, an increase of 121.6 per cent, or more than 12 per cent per annum. Wouldn't you like to have a business in which the value of the physical plant increased, almost wholly by appreciation, at the rate of 12 per cent per annum on a 10-year average?

And in the next decade, to 1920, the average value advanced again, from $96 to $255 per acre, an increase of 165.6 per cent, or of 16.5 per cent per annum throughout the 10 years. In the 20 years from 1900 to 1920 the increase was $211.69 per acre, or but a trifle under 500 per cent for the period. Is there anyone in this audience who ever knew of another business in which the physical plant had an enhancement of value at the rate of 25 per cent per year for 20 years?

The war, of course, had much to do with the final stages of this inflation, and that was not a permanent factor, but apparently the public accepted it as permanent. That is where it went astray.

Now, gentlemen, I venture to say that no business can stand such "prosperity" as that. It is not in average human nature to go through such an experience and come out unscathed.

The opportunities for quick money making tempt men to use their credit to the limit, a great body of indebtedness is created, all ordinary standards of value are lost sight of, and the strain increases until the whole inflated structure of credit and prices breaks down.

I remember a story that I heard Mr. Bryan tell many years ago. He told it to illustrate a different argument, but it suits this situation very well. It was about a man named John, who was a very good sort of fellow, but occasionally would drink too much. This was a long time ago. A friend was expostulating with him about his habit, and said: "You know, John, that you have this weakness; you know you are in danger of taking too much; why don't you, when you know you have had enough, and you are asked to take more, ask for something that is not intoxicating? Ask for sarsaparilla, for example." "Well," said John, "that sounds all right, but when I get that far along I can't say sarsaparilla!"

The trouble out in Iowa in 1919 and 1920 was that so many people could not say "sarsaparilla!"

In 1919 the Iowa Bankers' Association held its annual meeting in my old home town, Fort Dodge, and the officers were thoughtful enough and kind enough to invite me to come out and address the convention. I went. The land boom was at its height, and to an outsider the situation was alarming. I ventured to comment upon it. I have a copy of that speech here, and I will ask the chairman to read only the last paragraph of those comments, for what was said then may be more impressive than anything that can be said now.

"I believe that the banker can render no better service to the farmer than by advising him to use the proceeds of these high prices to pay off his debts. It is a singular fact that people commonly go into debt in good times and pay their debts under pressure in bad times."

Iowa is in the Chicago reserve district, and at the time that convention was held the Iowa members of the Reserve Bank of Chicago owed the reserve bank about $12,000,000. There was a good crop in Iowa in that year, as there nearly always is, and prices of farm products were high. The break in prices did not come until the latter part of 1920, but when the break did come the member banks of Iowa owed the Reserve Bank of Chicago not $12,000,000 but $98,000,000. And they owed a lot of borrowed money elsewhere besides.

The farm-mortgage debt of Iowa in 1910 was $204,000,000 and in 1920, $490,000,000, an increase of 140 per cent, in the period of highest prices for farm products and greatest increase of farm values ever known in the history of American agriculture. That increase of indebtedness did not signify distress at the time any more than the increase of brokers' loans in New York in the past two years has signified distress. Distress, however, followed later.

Now, all this simply illustrates the well-known truth that people do not use the profits of good times to pay their debts. They use them as the basis of further borrowing. The farmers are no different in this respect from other people. It is the same in commodity speculation—in wheat, cotton, or sugar—in stock speculation, as we have seen time and again in Wall Street, and in town-lot speculation, as we have seen in Florida.

I am not unsympathetic for the people, farmers and others, who lost money by the collapse of speculation and fall of prices in 1920–21. I am not blaming or ridiculing the farmers who became involved. I am simply pointing to the true case of their misfortunes and saying that such losses can not possibly be prevented or made good by legislation. In this case they were largely due to the war, and the private losses in all countries due to the war were incalculable.

The war deranged industry generally over the world. It overstimulated production in many lines. The conditions were so abnormal that it is a wonder now that everybody did not understand that they were temporary. In Cuba the price of sugar rose as high as 20 cents per pound, and they doubled the area in cane. The area was doubled also in Java and in other countries outside of Europe. When beet-sugar production recovered in Europe the world had more sugar than it could use, and the price in Cuba is down now to about 2 cents, and the industry is in great distress.

The print-paper industry, the lumber industry, the textile industry, the bituminous-coal industry, and many others have had the same experience. It takes a long time to overcome such a disturbance.

The area of land in grain was greatly expanded during the war in countries outside of Europe, especially in the United States, Argentina, and Australia. The production of wheat in Canada in the five years ended with 1913 averaged under 200,000,000 bushels per year, and in the five years ended with 1928 above 400,000,000 bushels. The Canadian production is still increasing; the crop of 1928 was over 500,000,000 bushels.

Furthermore, the area of land under cultivation in the United States is increasing. The area planted to cotton in Texas increased from 10,470,000 acres in 1919 to 18,374,000 acres in 1926. In the four States of Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas the acreage in wheat has more than doubled in the last 10 years.

This, of course, is voluntary expansion, like the settlement of Oklahoma 40 years ago, in the face of what are said to be unremunerative prices. What would production be if the Government was to guarantee higher prices?

What can the Government do with a price-fixing program under conditions like that? We can not produce wheat in excess of the demand at a given price, and have an increasing carry-over from year to year, without breaking the price. I venture to say that you may organize and agitate and legislate till the cows come home, as we used to say in Iowa, and that so long as the supply increases the price will decline. We need to get people out of the wheat business instead of more people into it.

Moreover, there are other developments which have affected the farming industry. The consumption of food products has undergone a noticeable change. The means of transportation now available are largely responsible for this. The consumption of fresh fruit and vegetables has enormously increased, and the per capita consumption of the old staples has declined. Senator NYE, of North Dakota, has recently introduced a resolution in the Senate for an investigation of the decline in the per capita consumption of flour, which he says has been 20 per cent since 1913.

Furthermore, the use of motor power has almost done away with the consumption of corn and oats in cities and towns, and diminished the consumption for work animals even on the farms.

I come now to another and most important factor in the situation, and that is the lowering cost of production. Back 70 or 80 years ago farming underwent a revolutionary change from hand power to horsepower. It is now undergoing another change, no less revolutionary, in character of implements and the use of power. The most outstanding of these new implements is the combined harvester and thresher, which is rapidly coming into use and which effects a very substantial saving in the cost of producing the small grains.

Plowing always has been one of the biggest jobs on the farm. One man with two horses and a single-bottomed plow could scarcely plow 2 acres per day, but one man with a tractor will plow 8 to 10 acres per day.

Until a few years ago the standard implement for cultivating corn was the single-row cultivator, operated by one man and two horses, but in the past season a 3-row cultivator has been in successful use, operated by one man and a tractor or equal horsepower. Practically the entire list of farm implements is undergoing change in a manner which greatly increases the effectiveness of man power.

The friends of the horse by no means give up the field to the tractor. They claim that multiple hitches, using 6, 10, and even more horses, are economically successful. The point is that machinery or higher capacity for all farm work is coming into use.

In 1921 and 1922 the agricultural-implement business was facing as discouraging a prospect as can be imagined, but to-day it is enjoying one of the greatest periods of prosperity in its history. Doubtless you have heard of the great boom in the New York stock market, but possibly you do not know that implement stocks are among the leaders. No longer ago than 1923 the common stock of the International Harvester Co. was selling at $65 to $70 per share; in recent months it has sold as high as $365 per share and has now been split up into smaller units. The common stock of the Case Threshing Machine Co., which in the spring of 1924 was selling at about $15 per share, is now selling around $500 per share.

The significance of all this is that the costs of production on the farms, in terms of man power, are being reduced; that a smaller number of workers on the farms will be able to produce the required supply of farm products; and that unless further expansion of farm area occurs the business will be more remunerative.

The release of agricultural workers is simply a continuance of a process which has been going on throughout the history of agriculture. A constantly diminishing percentage of the population has been able to supply the required quantity of farm products.

One hundred years ago 75 per cent or more of the population of this country was required on the farms; now the situation is reversed, with only 25 per cent living on the farms and 75 per cent deriving its support primarily from other sources of income.

Surely this change is not deplorable. We would not want to go back to the farming methods and the farm life of 100 years ago—to the wooden plow, the cradle, and the hoe in the field and the spinning wheel and the household industries in the home. We would not want to try to locate 75 per cent of our present population on the land at labor, as then, from sunrise to sundown, or to give up all the comforts which the modern industrial system has provided. The general rise of the standard of living of the masses consists in the main of the increased supply of things other than farm products, and these are to be found in the farm homes as well as elsewhere.

If we do not welcome increased efficiency in production, what shall we do about the research work of the State colleges of agriculture and of the United States department? Shall we stop trying to grade up our dairy cows and our meat-producing animals? All of this work tends to increase the supply of farm products and to reduce the percentage of the population required on farms. It increases the powers and improves the position of the farmers who adopt the new methods, but it increases the pressure upon the farmers who do not adopt them.

What are we going to do about this increase in productive power which is impending, and indeed is in sight? The present farm leadership seems to have set its face firmly against any movement of population from the farms to other industries. It apparently holds that the Government should assure remunerative prices for farm products, no matter how many people enter the industry or how much the facilities of production are increased! Surely this proposition can not be maintained as to any industry. The conditions in industry are always changing, and the people in every industry must adapt themselves to the changes. Any other conclusion would mean industrial and social stagnation.

Why such determined opposition to any movement of population from the farms to the cities? Would the farmers rather have an expansion of their own industry or of the other industries? In the one case they will have more competitors and in the other they have more customers. If all of the present farm population stay on the farms and all of the remaining land available for cultivation is brought under crop we shall continue to have increasing production, prices will fall lower, and the benefits of lower production cost will be passed on to consumers.

On the other hand, if instead of rapidly increasing the area of land under cultivation, the farm workers who are released by the new machinery will find employment in other industries, the production of the farm staples will not be rapidly increased, farm-land values will be stabilized, and the benefits of the new machinery will be at least shared by the farmers.

It is said that the present trend means the industrialization of the country at the expense of the farmers, but it is only what has been going on in every industry since the application of power to industry began. Industrialization has been going on in transportation ever since the days of the oxcart, and in the textile industries ever since the days of hand spinning. What has become of the stagecoach business and the carriage business? Men are losing their jobs in all the industries by the increasing efficiency of machinery, and it has been so for a hundred years, but they find other—often better—jobs, and social conditions are improved.

Progress in agriculture can not be stayed. The progressive farmers will be prosperous and want to buy more land, and the unprogressive ones will find it advantageous to sell out to them. The law of the survival of the fittest does not mean that anybody must be starved. It simply means that people are under pressure to find the places for which they are best fitted for their own good and that of society. Society has rights, and it is concerned that the land shall be occupied by the people who will make the best use of it. An individual may not be qualified to build up and manage a fine herd of dairy cows but be well qualified to milk and care for them under some one else, or to drive a truck or do many other kinds of work.

The chief expenditures of the masses of the people are for food, clothing, and shelter, and it is here that we must find the gains for any important rise of the standard of living. During the war the British Government was given authority to take farm operations out of the hands of farm owners if necessary to obtain increased efficiency, and as population increases in all countries it may be accepted as certain that at least no policy will be long tolerated which deliberately enhances the cost of these necessaries.

If this reasoning means that the number of farmers should be reduced, it does not follow that the entire industry will be disrupted. A great proportion of the farmers are prosperous to-day, but it is true that an important section are on the border line between existence and bankruptcy. A large movement both ways is constantly going on between town and country. In 1927, according to the Department of Agriculture, 1,978,000 persons left the farms for cities and towns, while 1,374,000 left the cities and towns for the farms, and so it has always been in varying proportions. The people who leave the farms do so because they believe that in their circumstances they can do better elsewhere, and it may be presumed that those who go under compulsion are in the border zone, and consist largely of employees, unmarried persons, tenants, or unprosperous owners who will be personally benefited by the change. Of course it is absurd to talk as though farms would be generally depopulated.

It is no part of the business of the Government to regulate prices. We live under a régime of liberty; in which everybody is free to choose the occupation he wants to follow, and production is regulated automatically by the price system. If prices are unduly low in any industry as compared with others, it is a sign that too many people are in that industry. If the Government is to determine how much shall be produced and what the compensation shall be in any industry, it must be authorized to tell everybody what work he shall do and what pay he shall have, which is not attempted anywhere but in Russia. The Government is not qualified to determine what is equality between the different industries—to say, for example, what is equality between a farmer, as an independent business man, with the probability of land appreciation in his favor, and a mechanic, dependent upon some one else for his job. There is no reason to believe that either farmers or mechanics would want the Government to fix the terms of their relationship. With freedom to make their own choice they can regulate the relationship themselves better than overhead authority can do it.

The argument sometimes offered that numerous other lines of business are the beneficiaries of legislation, and therefore that proposed legislation for the farmers should be granted, does not stand examination. The transportation act and Federal reserve act are of the nature of regulatory statutes. Railroad charges are regulated by the Government for the protection of the public; but since the Government undertakes to fix charges, obviously it should fix them to allow a fair return, otherwise capital for railroad expansion will not be available. The Federal reserve act was not passed as a favor to banks and does not impose higher charges of any kind upon the public.

The argument from the protective tariff is fallacious. The protective tariff is intended to stimulate and develop home production, but in the case of agriculture we already have a surplus of home production. Whoever heard of subsidizing a surplus?

The argument from the protective tariff assumes that the protected industries make profits larger than the general average of business profits, but this is not true, as an examination of the textile, steel, and other protected industries will show. The protected industries are open to everybody, upon the sole condition that they shall be located within the country, and in a country where domestic competition is as active as in the United States it is impossible for these industries to long make profits above the general level of business profits. The legitimate argument over the merits of protection relates wholly to general benefits. It is not a question of providing larger profits for a selected list of industries than other industries make, but whether under existing conditions it is better public policy to make certain products here or import them. The answer may be different as to different industries, but the benefits, if any, are general and the costs, if any, are general.

In conclusion I do not wish what I have said here to be understood as in opposition to action in redemption of the promises made by President-elect Hoover in the recent campaign. I am skeptical toward all legislation which looks to the direct control of prices, but our Government is based upon popular opinion, and I recognize that the sincere beliefs of a great body of people are entitled to respect and consideration.

I think that President-elect Hoover should be supported in carrying out the moderate program to which he is pledged, and I believe the report of the committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States contains a number of meritorious proposals. I wish especially to indorse the suggestion that the Federal Government shall set about recovering extensive areas of marginal lands, now under unprofitable cultivation, for the purpose of devoting it to forestry and other purposes which it is better fitted for than for farming.

I am firmly opposed to all highly artificial plans which contemplate systematic dumping of farm products abroad at lower prices than those at which they are sold at home.

The policy is unsound in principle and produces irritation, resentment, and retaliation even when practiced in private business. If adopted as a national policy, sponsored by a government, it would quickly produce international complications. If we desire friendly and peaceful international relations we should avoid practices of that kind which we ourselves resent when practiced by others. Every country is under obligations to do its share in maintaining industry on a balanced and remunerative basis, instead of dumping its surpluses in foreign markets without regard to the demoralization which may result.

I am opposed also to any plan which interposes obstacles to natural progress in industry. No plan which violates fundamental principles will be of any permanent value.

RELIEF OF FARMERS

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement made by my colleague Mr. LARSEN before the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement made by his colleague, Mr. LARSEN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following remarks of Hon. W. W. LARSEN, of Georgia, before the House Agricultural Committee on January 15, 1929, considering legislation for the relief of farmers in the storm and flood stricken areas of the southeastern United States:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee: I desire to indorse the provisions of this bill and urge its early passage. The farmers of Georgia, especially in the southeastern section, are in great need of immediate financial assistance if they are to cultivate farms this year. Their present condition is due to crop failures of last year, resulting from unusual weather conditions. In the early spring heavy rains throughout the section necessitated the replanting of crops and purchase of additional fertilizer after much had been washed away. Splendid progress was made by the growers during the short time in which conditions were such that they might cultivate crops, but just before maturity, and immediately following the September hurricane, the cotton and corn crops were almost ruined, not only by winds but excessive rains as well. In one section of my district, at Hawkinsville, I am told that 12 inches of rain fell within 24 hours. Rains destroyed the corn pollen, thereby preventing a normal yield, and the constant wet weather in the fall caused much that was made to rot in the fields. The cotton was beaten into the earth and immature bolls so greatly damaged that they never matured. The peach crop was so injured by rains that a large per cent of it was unfit for shipment because of rot, and tobacco was so damaged that a normal price could not be secured for this commodity. The pecan belt also suffered from the excessive rains. The wet weather caused defective nuts and the high winds blew many of them from the trees, making additional losses. Added to these crop losses an epidemic of cholera among swine caused many farmers to lose their hogs, so the people are not only without bread but meat as well. Many who have always lived comfortably are without proper food. They depended upon income from peach, tobacco, and nut crops to purchase clothing and other actual necessities and when faced by these failures they had nothing to look to, were unable to pay taxes, or other debts, and thousands of them will be unable to operate farms this year unless some aid is granted.

Mr. Chairman, I realize that this sounds distressing to gentlemen who have not studied conditions in this particular section; and I assure you it is distressing—even more so than I have set forth. Hundreds of banks have failed during recent years, and those now operating are unable to grant financial assistance. Crop failures have made it impossible for many of them to collect 20 per cent of the amounts loaned last year.

In this connection I desire to quote a few statements from prominent persons engaged in different lines of business other than agriculture in my district, which I believe set forth the true conditions better than I can.

A prominent naval-stores man writes as follows:

"I believe the twelfth district is the hardest hit of any section of Georgia. I have never seen anything like present conditions with farmers around here. I know a good many who have started their plows without feedstuff for their stock and provisions for the family, and their supply will not last 30 days. How they are going to make a crop without some help or relief I don't know. I don't believe the country banks in this section have collected over 25 per cent, so how can they come to the relief of the farmer to make this crop? I feel that if you can get some immediate relief for the farmers in your district you will have done them a favor you would probably never do again."

A reliable banker in my section advises:

"If aid can be rushed for those who suffered from storms last summer it will not come any too soon. Mr. LARSEN, it is distressing to see the condition some people are in and in order for them to be able to make crops for another year it is absolutely necessary that aid be not long delayed. I feel that if some had lost their homes by fire or floods they could not be in any worse condition for they are unable to carry on where they are. I know of some people who have moved from their own farms to go with others as share croppers and the ones they have gone to really are not able to take care of them."

A dependable warehouseman writes:

"Help in the way of loans, properly handled, would be a wonderful help to the farmers in this section who are down and out without some such assistance. Possibly it will be argued by some that the local banks can take care of the worthy farmers but this is not true. In the first place, deposits in the local banks are so low they have but little money available for loans and the past two years have been so near crop failures that the local banks are afraid to loan much money to farmers even with pretty fair security in addition to the crop lien. Knowing your interest in the welfare of the farmers of your district, I feel it unnecessary to urge you to do all you possibly can to get some relief enacted."

An attorney, thoroughly familiar with conditions, writes:

"Go ahead and vote for any emergency relief bill for the farmers. I would do something if it were the wrong thing, for the Lord knows this is the worst situation I have ever known. It is really pitiable the shape people are in."

Mr. Chairman, a survey of the Georgia situation was recently made by Doctor Campbell, of the University of Georgia. It was found that there are 36,000 farmers in our State who are in need of financial assistance and that 18,000 of this number will be unable to carry on their crops without aid from some source. Officials making survey estimate that there will be needed from two to three hundred dollars per plow, or from $3,600,000 to $5,400,000. I would say a most conservative estimate for Georgia would be $5,000,000. Under the laws of my State the Government would be well protected as regards the matter of loans. A first lien may be provided on the crop produced where loans are made direct to the landowner, and in the event loan is made to the tenant, a waiver may be taken from the landlord which would have the effect of creating a first lien in favor of the Government against the crop of such tenant. I consider this a very liberal protection, and no loss should result to the Government under normal conditions.

I want to see this bill reported to the House and passed promptly, as it must be done if aid is to be extended. Such aid has been granted by the Government to farmers, under like conditions, in other sections of the Nation, and I am sure it should not now be withheld from the distressed farmers in the sections covered by the pending bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—CLAIMS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS AGAINST GERMANY (H. DOC. NO. 556)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in relation to the agreement between the United States and Germany of December 31, 1928, for the adjudication of claims of American citizens against Germany arising out of the World War which were not notified to the commission in time to be considered under the agreement of August 10, 1922, between the United States and Germany for the adjudication of American claims.

Subsection (e) of section 2 of the "settlement of war claims act of 1928" provides that there shall be deducted from the amount of each payment on awards of the Mixed Claims Commission, United States and Germany, as reimbursement for the expenses incurred by the United States in connection with the adjudication of the claims an amount "equal to one-half of 1 per cent thereof," which amount it is provided shall be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

I recommend that the one-half of 1 per cent which the Secretary of the Treasury is thus authorized to deduct from awards shall, in so far as regards these late claims, be made available to the German Government for defraying such expenses as may be incurred by that Government in connection with the adjudication of such claims.

PROHIBITION SENTIMENT IN MARYLAND

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. Several times the impression has been sought to be created in this Chamber that the State of Maryland has undergone a change of heart in relation to prohibition. I desire to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a dispatch appearing in the Baltimore Evening Sun from Annapolis on the 5th instant, bringing the attention of the public to the fact that a proposed prohibition State enforcement law in the State of Maryland has just been defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Evening Sun Bureau]

PROPOSED STATE DRY LAW DEFEATED BY DELEGATES AND SQUASHED FOR SESSION—MEASURE BEATEN IN HOUSE AFTER BEING UNFAVORABLY REPORTED BY COMMITTEE ON TEMPERANCE—ATTEMPT TO SUBSTITUTE IT FOR REPORT GOES DOWN UNDER VOTES OF WET BLOC—VOTE ON UNFAVORABLE ACTION THEN RECONSIDERED AND REPORT LAID ON TABLE AS MANEUVER TO PREVENT RECURRENCE

STATEHOUSE, ANNAPOLIS, February 5.—The proposed dry law for Maryland was defeated in the house of delegates to-day and nailed down with a legislative clincher which will prevent any other measure having the same subject matter from coming before the house for the remainder of the session.

Mr. BRUCE. I would like to have inserted at the same time and ask to have read——

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I shall really have to object to anything being read in my time.

Mr. BRUCE. Very well; I shall offer it later.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, in view of the request of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] and the bitter debate of yesterday afternoon, I trust that it will not be considered an unpardonable asperity for me to voice the hope that the Members of the Senate will some time end their acrimonious discussion of religion and prohibition and begin to practice the precepts of the one and obey the laws of the other.

CONSERVATION OF WILD LIFE—ADDRESS OF HON. HARRY B. HAWES

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech delivered by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] on the duty of Congress to conserve wild life. The speech was delivered over the radio Tuesday, February 5, at 7 p. m.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

THE DUTY OF CONGRESS TO CONSERVE WILD LIFE

Patriotic and public-spirited women have requested me to occupy your time for a few minutes in discussing wild-life conservation and the "big outdoors," indicating some things that Congress may do.

Very naturally the most effective conservation must come from the State, but there is a supplemental work to be carried on by the Federal Government which presents a large and inviting field for congressional action.

Fortunately, public sentiment has developed to a very high degree in favor of wild-life conservation.

The Izaak Walton League, with its 2,000 chapters scattered throughout the United States, the Boy Scouts, with their outdoor training, the Girl Scouts, game and fish protective associations, and game wardens are displaying unusual energy and persistence in not only directing State and National attention to this subject, but are securing real practical enactments, both State and Federal.

Our recent participation in the World War and the physical examination given to some 4,000,000 men called under the draft disclosed an appalling number of physically unfit. It shocked national conscience. It was a surprise to many men who went through these physical examinations, and they have undoubtedly tried to remedy the defects then discovered and have found that the best reparation comes from exercise in the "big outdoors."

The meetings of the American Legion, the summer training of reserve officers, have advanced both the study of and an enthusiasm for this subject.

The golfer has done his part. Nearly every community in every portion of the United States now has its golf course, all part of the movement for outdoor exercise, all leading to more enthusiasts for outdoor play and recreation.

Propaganda, therefore, is not so necessary as formerly; but there is a demand for concentrating national thought on this subject and reducing it to express terms of State and National legislative enactments.

We have been draining our swamp lands and destroying natural sanctuaries; cutting down and wiping out our forests; destroying wild-life refuges.

We have been polluting our streams and destroying in this way, thoughtlessly but ruthlessly, fish, animal, and bird life.

And we are at the same time destroying human life and shortening our years of usefulness.

We all know that exercise and proper food are two of the great elements necessary for health, but we are now beginning to understand that the third great element is pure air, lots of it, and that a change of air is as necessary as a change in exercise and diet. This is procured only in the "big outdoors."

Congress can stop the pollution of all navigable streams. It can purchase now, at a small price, while lands are cheap, and especially during its national work of reclamation and flood control, swamp lands and other areas.

It can protect birds and wild fowl in their migratory flight.

It can supply game sanctuaries in waste lands, protecting the breeding and propagation of bird and animal life.

It can, through its agencies, fight the fish and game hog, protect fish during the spawning season and game during the mating season.

It can reduce the size of the bag, the number of the catch, and, by intelligent bulletins, educate sportsmen, anglers, and campers in the matter of conservation.

It can use overflow lands in our river basins for sanctuaries.

It can use the great national highways for reforestation.

It certainly can preserve Government lands in their native state.

All navigable streams are under Federal jurisdiction. Their pollution can be stopped, fish traps destroyed, spillways built, trapping and seining of certain species prohibited.

It can purchase and set aside great national game sanctuaries in each of the States.

In the midst of a busy and strenuous congressional life I have found both a fine mental and physical exhilaration in giving some attention to this subject.

Finding that there are some 7,000,000 dogs in the United States, I secured the publication of national bulletins for the benefit of "man's best friend," secured the enactment of a law for the upper Mississippi River, which embraces some 300 miles of river-shore line, and the purchase of 250,000 acres of waste bottom lands, all put in one great fish and game sanctuary; a national bill protecting the black bass in the District of Columbia, and another bill prohibiting the interstate shipment of black bass for commercial purposes.

Scientists have told us that the yearly toll of black bass is so great compared with the yearly hatch that this greatest of American fishes is certain to become extinct within 10 years unless the States and the Nation preserve it.

The bass is undoubtedly the great American game fish and the favorite fish of millions of the rank and file of American anglers.

It is strange but true that the building of our great highways has been a new contributing cause of the extermination of fish and wild life. It has brought the fisherman and hunter in closer contact with his game. It has made it easier to catch fish and kill ducks and other game. Formerly it required a whole day for a fishing trip. Now, in the automobile, a few hours bridge the distance.

We issue each year over 7,000,000 hunting licenses, and over 15,000,000 fishing licenses. Nearly twice as many men take out these hunting licenses as were in our American Army in the World War; over three times as many men and women take out fishing licenses.

Try to imagine this terrific toll in the destruction of wild life!

It becomes necessary, therefore, to bring an understanding to our citizenship which will cause it to consider it a crime to rob America of its outdoor lands, and that our Nation's welfare and health depend upon the conservation of our woods, waters, and wild life.

Personally, I think this conservation makes for better citizenship. It preserves some of the frontier spirit of our forefathers.

It is said these forefathers came with the Bible in one hand and a rifle in the other. Some of their descendants have lost the rifle; some the Bible; some both the Bible and the rifle. We must restore the confidence and strength that a knowledge of the rifle brings, while we are preserving the spiritual strength that comes from the Bible.

We must bring back, by purchase, as much of the "big outdoors" as possible, where strong men in spiritual power find their best nourishment.

When we lose our "pep," when good food tastes bad, when friends do not satisfy, when life becomes a bore, when music seems out of tune, when the old dog annoys, when the doctor fails, and the good wife irritates, there is but one remedy for the run-down, and it is found in the forests and on the streams in the "big outdoors."

There we go to church and worship God by conversing with the things that he made, listening to sermons from rocks and trees and choir music from the birds.

If you need a fresh start and want to lose the run-down feeling and get back your "pep," go fishing.

It is a notable fact that of the twelve Apostles selected by Christ four were fishermen.

They were natural philosophers who made their living in the big, wide open; who knew the stars, the tempest, the sea, the sun, the moon, the winds, and the calm.

They were prepared for a campaign for men because they had first campaigned with the elements of nature.

Study of nature had prepared them for a study of men, and their thoughts and teachings were big, like the outdoors from whence they came.

Every great man we have had was an outdoor man. Every man with big thoughts is at some time compelled to get away from the little things that cramp and bind and forced to seek a revitalization, new energy, and a broader perspective by contact with nature.

The city bed and fancy sanitation are luxuries made more attractive by a week on the ground; the camp fire makes the radiator endurable; the flapjack, the bacon, and the browned fish bring the "comeback" after hard work and the hotel menu.

The city and the town have their call, but they have a sameness and a "too sureness" to be palatable for all of the 12 months.

To find rest we must find a change. The same streets, the same roofs, the same faces, the same sights, though of the best, like food of the same kind, pall upon the appetite and tire the brain.

We must find real rest by seeking contrast, by finding the "big outdoors," by not living too much and too long indoors.

The doctor tries his medicine and fails, the friend his companionship and fails; and if they are wise physicians and thoughtful friends, they advise a change of scenery, a new environment.

What is becoming of our "big outdoors"? Where are the animals, the birds, and the fishes whose presence renewed the primitive and stronger natural instincts? They are disappearing, now almost gone.

Can individuals stay their departure? Can citizens hold these things for our children? Not by individual action. Only the State and Nation are strong enough to keep these retreats and asylums for the benefit of both the wild things and for men and women.

When we lose the "big outdoors," we lose part of our national pride, pluck, and patriotism.

When we keep the "big outdoors," we keep our best thoughts, our best resolutions, and, above all, our best traditions.

When we keep our "outdoors" we make a real, substantial, dividend-paying investment in national prosperity, in national health, in national conscience, and public welfare.

The "big outdoors" saves the strength, saves the nerves, saves the brain, and saves the doctor bill.

Our Federal Government should buy some of the "big outdoors" now, when opportunity knocks and the price is cheap, and then buy more when opportunity comes again.

The "big outdoors" is for the poor and for the rich; it is for all of our people; and we can not buy too much now, for soon there will be none to buy.

If you want to lend a hand, write to your State and Federal lawmakers. If they know you are in earnest about it, they will respond by making the necessary laws.

Let me thank you for your consideration and attention.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 15092) to authorize an appropriation to pay half the cost of a bridge near the Soboba Indian Reservation, Calif., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF HEALTH

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I rise to discuss Senate bill 4518, to create a national institute of health, to create a system of fellowships in said institute, and to authorize the Government to accept donations for use in ascertaining the cause, prevention, and cure of disease affecting human beings, and for other purposes, which was first introduced by me July 1, 1926, reintroduced December 9, 1927, again reintroduced May 21, 1928, and favorably reported to the Senate May 25, 1928.

While this measure is being briefly explained I appeal for the attention of all Senators who in their own persons or in the persons of members of their families have suffered from disease. This bill is unique, and differs from any presented to Congress during the 30 years of my public service. Its purposes are wholly altruistic. It seeks to prevent sickness and suffering among all human beings, regardless of station, the rich and poor alike being subject to the same illness and pain. It does not offer special aid or advantage to anyone, but its benefits reach all mankind. It is not sponsored by selfish interests, though favored by many who love their fellows, and depends for support upon its merits alone.

THE INTENT OF THE BILL

The object of this bill is to promote the health of human beings, to improve their earning capacity, to reduce their living expenses, to increase their happiness, and prolong their lives.

It seeks to prevent disease by ascertaining its cause and applying preventive measures in advance of its outbreak.

It serves unselfish interests, and its beneficent results will enter every home in the Nation.

It appreciates that disease is universal and ignores State and National lines, hence it seeks to establish in this Capital City a great national institute of health in the belief that it will become a clearing house of health for all the world.

It has received the indorsements of distinguished men of science and of many national organizations of scientific research.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I should like to call attention to the platform, adopted at the last Democratic convention, indorsing specifically this proposal of the Senator from Louisiana, and, with his permission, I should like to have it inserted in the RECORD. I will have it read, or I will have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should be glad to have the Senator from Arkansas read it, if he will.

Mr. CARAWAY. I will read it. It is as follows:

PUBLIC HEALTH

The Democratic Party recognizes that not only the productive wealth of the Nation but its contentment and happiness depend upon the health of its citizens. It therefore pledges itself to enlarge the existing Bureau of Public Health and to do all things possible to stamp out communicable and contagious diseases and to ascertain preventive means and remedies for these diseases, such as cancer, infantile paralysis, and others which heretofore have largely defied the skill of physicians.

We pledge our party to spare no means to lift the apprehension of diseases from the minds of our people and to appropriate all moneys necessary thereto to carry out this pledge.

That plank was adopted unanimously by the Democratic National Convention at Houston last June.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Louisiana, I might add that the plank just read was prepared and presented by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

Mr. RANSDELL. I am glad to have that contribution also. I think the Senator from Arkansas performed a very worthy and important public service when he proposed and secured the adoption of that plank of the platform.

Mr. President, the bill contains three distinct features:

First. The creation of a national institute of health in the Public Health Service under the administrative direction and control of the Surgeon General, for the special purpose of pure scientific research to ascertain the cause, prevention, and cure of diseases affecting human beings. It does not create any new bureaus or new commissions, but utilizes existing Government machinery and provides for much enlargement of the Hygienic Laboratory, which is merged in and made an essential part of the national institute. It authorizes appropriation of such sums as may be adequate to carry out the provisions of the measure.

Second. It authorizes the Treasury Department to accept gifts unconditionally for study, investigation, and research in problems relating to the health of man and matters pertaining thereto, with the proviso that if gifts in the sum of half a million dollars or more are made, the name of the donor shall be attached thereto.

Third. It proposes the establishment and maintenance in the institute of a system of fellowships in scientific research in order to secure the proper scientific personnel and to encourage and aid men and women of marked proficiency to combat the diseases that menace human health.

THE PLAN OF THE INSTITUTE

The plan of the institute is to make of it a great cooperative scientific organization in which leading experts in every branch of science will be brought together and given opportunity to work in unison for the purpose of discovering all the natural laws governing human life, and especially to learn those variations of such laws which are detrimental to human health. It is confidently believed that if there is brought together in one central place, under one directing head, the very ablest experts in the sciences of medicine, surgery, chemistry, physics, biology, bacteriology, pharmacology, pharmacy, dentistry, and so forth, and a concentrated, united effort for a term of years is made by them against disease, singling out first the more important maladies such as cancer, tuberculosis, common cold, pneumonia, and so forth, that success will result therefrom.

While very remarkable and most beneficial efforts have been made in the war against disease by our great medical schools and endowed institutions, there has never been in any one place a combination and concentration of all the branches of science such as is contemplated in the national institute of health. In our medical schools, hospitals, and health institutions of many kinds, public and private, constant work is in progress and should be generously supported; but too often the workers are isolated and can devote only part time to research because of other duties. Too often the chemist needs the knowledge and technique of the biologist, and equally often the biologist needs the chemist's information and point of view.

It is thought that liberal donations to assist in the support of the institute will be made by public-spirited citizens who desire to benefit their fellow men. Any such gifts will be held in trust by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the income thereof administered by the Surgeon General solely for the purposes indicated in the bill, with all the safeguards attendant upon Federal appropriations. These donations must be accepted by the Secretary "unconditionally for study, investigation, and research in problems of the diseases of man and matters pertaining thereto." A case in point is the Smithsonian Institution, which was established by a donation of $550,000 made by James Smithson, an Englishman, in 1826 to the United States for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men. The Smithsonian Institution is one of the greatest research institutions in the world, and has been of incalculable value. How much good might have accrued had Smithson been able to make a similar donation for the purpose of preventing disease among men? Another case is a Federal statute passed several years ago authorizing the Library of Congress to accept donations, under which authority about $2,000,000 have been received.

The system of fellowships for researchers of demonstrated proficiency is a most important one. They would offer inducement and opportunty for those specially qualified for this line of research to serve their fellow men in the most useful of all ways. Moreover, the larger salaries permissible under this system would insure retention of many high-grade scientists who in the past have been lost to other institutions by flattering financial offers. While it is contemplated that the bulk of this research work will be carried out in the laboratories in Washington, nevertheless it is not so limited, for under the terms of the bill these "fellows" could be assigned to a definite problem in educational or endowed institutions in any other part of this or other countries, wherever it would be most advantageous for the problem to be worked upon. The existence of such fellowships will direct the attention of promising young men and women to the desirability of equipping themselves for life work in this most important of all fields of applied science. A system of fellowships established by the Rockefeller Foundation in its war on hookworm was found to be very successful, and aided that great organization materially in bringing this disease under control.

THE NECESSITY FOR A NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF HEALTH

Disease is the greatest and most formidable enemy of human life, also of animal and vegetable life. There are millions of sufferers from painful, consuming diseases about which little or nothing is known, but which cause many deaths and great economic loss. A vast amount of pure research work demands the attention of scientists, and its application for the prevention of sickness and alleviation of suffering. It is only through the joint, intensive, cooperative efforts of chemist, physicist, physiologist, pharmacologist, pathologist, immunologist, dentist, surgeon, physician, and so forth, that preventive measures and remedies must come for unconquered diseases. We can not plead that there is no field for our Government to enter. The problems to be solved are manifold.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will be glad to yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. The persistent and appalling increase in the death rate from cancer, which is mankind's most deadly and defiant foe, refutes the anticipated contention that there is no field of conquest for the institute which the Senator from Louisiana seeks to establish.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is quite true. I understand that last year something like 120,000 human beings died from cancer in this country.

Mr. NEELY. The complete statistics for 1928 are not available. But during the year 1927 more than 103,000 died from cancer in the registration area of the United States, which included only 91 per cent of our population. And since the adjournment of Congress last year cancer has vacated two of the seats in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator; and I should like to add, as the Senator states, that if there were nothing else to fight but cancer it would be well worth while to make the effort.

To illustrate, I will name a few of the more common diseases which still baffle medical skill and remain a curse to humanity: Hay fever, anemia, mental troubles, heart disease, diseases of tonsils and adenoids, infection of the teeth, stones in the bladder or kidney, nephritis, rheumatism, diabetes, common cold, influenza, tuberculosis, pneumonia, cancer, high and low blood pressure. This list of unconquered diseases is only a partial one, but what a vast field for research work. It illustrates convincingly the imperative need for a national institute of health. The problems to be solved are not limited to the diseases which have afflicted man throughout centuries.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RANSDELL. I am glad to yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I assume that the Senator, in the course of his remarks, will say something more about influenza.

Mr. RANSDELL. I intend to do so, sir; but I shall be glad if the Senator will tell us about it now, because I know of no man in the country better qualified than he to explain it. I shall be glad if he will do so at this moment.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. In connection with what he has just said about the unconquerable disease, it is a lamentable thing to think that in the course of 10 years since the dreadful epidemic of 1918 no progress whatever has been made in the control or cure or prevention of influenza. To my mind, it demonstrates as much as any one thing can how important it is that the bill proposed by the Senator from Louisiana should be enacted into law. We spend millions for hog cholera and plant diseases and the diseases of animals, and I am glad we do, because it is very necessary that we should have food, both animal food and plant food; but we are neglecting, and neglecting in a very serious way, any effort to control human disease.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be glad to yield as soon as the Senator from New York finishes.

Mr. COPELAND. I hope the Senator from North Carolina will ask his question now.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not mean by this question that I am opposed to this bill. The Senator is informed on this subject; and I desire to ask him how many institutes for this purpose have been established by donations in this country? There is the Rockefeller Foundation or Institute. How many others are there? There is one in Chicago, I believe.

Mr. COPELAND. I am very glad to answer the Senator from North Carolina. There are a great many institutions. The Rockefeller Foundation, the Rockefeller Institute in New York, is doing a wonderful amount of work in limited fields—for instance, in pneumonia—and the contributions it has made to medical science are not only interesting but they are tremendously important, because certain types of pneumonia now are brought under control by what has been accomplished by the Rockefeller Foundation. But the Senator has pointed out this fact: There are a great many independent workers about the country in small laboratories where these men have gone forward with the solution of the problems presented, and they have gone just as far as the facilities of that limited laboratory will permit. They have reached the point where they need the advice of men in other branches of science in order that they may go forward with them, and that is contemplated by this measure.

For instance, suppose that in the State of North Carolina there was a laboratory of distinction, as there is in that State; there are several, indeed. The time must come when the men in those laboratories have exhausted the possibilities of research, so far as those particular institutions are concerned. They need the larger opportunities for work that would be afforded by the national institute of health proposed by the Senator from Louisiana; and then, more than that, this bill contemplates that the Government may go to the laboratory in North Carolina, supply it with funds, and if need be with workers, in order that they may coordinate and embellish and enlarge upon the work done there, and so out of this coordination will grow positive progress in the knowledge and prevention of disease.

It is an interesting thing. As the Senator presenting the matter knows, there came before the subcommittee laboratory men from Yale and Harvard and other great universities where research is going on to say that they welcomed this place of coordinated effort; and so I think there may come out of it, if it is enacted into law, something of real benefit to humanity.

But I want to go back to influenza.

In 1918 we had an epidemic of influenza which traveled over the entire world. More persons died from influenza in 1918 than died in all the wars of all history. Just think of it! More persons died from influenza than in all the wars of all history. That was 10 years ago; and yet when the influenza came this year we found ourselves in possession of no more knowledge of the nature of the disease or its control or cure than we had in 1918. I believe, if the Senator will permit me to say it, that if his measure is enacted into law there will be established an institution which will do in some measure for human beings in this city what the great Agricultural Department has done for plant and animal life; and certainly we are just as much interested, Mr. President, in the preservation of human life as we are in the preservation of the lower animals and of plant life.

I am sorry that I took so much of the Senator's time.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am very glad, indeed, the Senator took the time; and, elaborating somewhat upon what he said about our liberal appropriations for plants and animals, in the five years prior to 1929 the total appropriations made by Congress for plant and animal life aggregated about $54,000,000; and they were all wise appropriations. They were to fight the diseases of animals and of plants, and we depend upon plants and animals for our food and living. During the same period we appropriated something under $4,000,000 to make scientific research and investigations into the diseases of human beings.

Think of that, Senators! Fifty-four millions for plant and animal disease; four millions for human beings! In my judgment, every dollar of those appropriations for plants and animals was wise; but let me ask, if those appropriations were wise, why not similar appropriations for human beings?

I had intended to discuss this matter in another place, but I will do so right now.

Doctor Dublin, the great statistician of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. of New York, the greatest insurance institution on earth, decidedly the largest, said recently in one of his published articles that the wealth of the United States composed of real estate, plants, animals, mines, and manufactured products of every kind and sort, aggregates $321,000,000,000. It is a big sum—three hundred and twenty-one billions. It is hard for me to understand such a sum. At the same time, he said that the value of our vital assets—our men and women—aggregates $1,500,000,000,000—more than five times the value of all of our property assets combined.

It is hard to follow these figures, but they are well worth while.

Now, Senators, let me repeat: Plants and animals constitute only a small percentage of that three hundred and twenty-one billions; and yet in five years we gave for diseases of plants and animals fifty-four millions at the same time that we gave four millions for human beings!

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. RANSDELL. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. I am very much interested in the Senator's statement, and I wondered if he had mentioned the matter of the damage done to our people in the South by malaria every year. Several years ago I introduced a bill in the Senate appropriating $500,000 for the eradication of malaria in the Southern States. Very few realize the great damage this disease has done in our section. Millions of dollars of damage is done by that disease annually. I should like to hear the Senator's views on that subject.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am glad to have that suggestion; and will show later, Mr. President, the enormous damage inflicted, not only by malaria but other diseases, to human beings. I will show, sir, that the damage to human beings caused by malaria and the other diseases—the preventable diseases at that—aggregates something over $9,000,000,000 every year. The figures are staggering.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator goes into history, he will find that the Roman Empire was destroyed by malaria. That was the foundation of its destruction.

To enlarge for a moment upon what the Senator has said about our appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, does it not raise the question of what is the purpose of government? Is the purpose of government merely the protection of property, or is it the protection also of human beings?

Mr. RANSDELL. And human happiness.

Mr. COPELAND. And human happiness. To me what the Senator has said is striking—$54,000,000 appropriated for animal and plant protection and $4,000,000 for the protection of human life. I think the proportion is not creditable to us and that we ought to do more, as the Senator has said, in order that human life, too, may be protected and that we shall not devote ourselves alone to the protection of property.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator. To proceed. New diseases appear on the horizon constantly and before them medical skill is impotent. Moreover, while the death rate of some diseases has been greatly decreased within the last quarter of a century, the rate for others has mounted year after year. To illustrate, I give below a brief table showing the death rates per 100,000 people in the United States in 1900 and 1927, in four diseases:

	1900	1927
Cancer and other malignant tumors	63.0	95.6
Diabetes mellitus	9.7	17.5
Diseases of the heart	132.1	195.7
Nephritis (acute and chronic)	89.0	95.5

The increase in rate for cancer and heart trouble is especially alarming, and if within the next few years the proposed national institute of health could discover cures for only these two diseases the world would owe an everlasting debt of gratitude to this country's scientists.

A STRIKING ILLUSTRATION OF NEED FOR RESEARCH

As a concrete example for the need of health research, let me cite the epidemic of influenza, so eloquently spoken of by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], which is sweeping the Nation at this very moment. Considering the modern epidemics of this disease, we begin with the winter of 1889 and 1890. At that time we were absolutely ignorant of the causes of the disease and had no ideas whatever as to its control. In 1918 we felt the effect of the most terrific attack of modern times. We found ourselves without knowledge of the preventive agent and therefore hopeless to combat the disease with any degree of scientific accuracy. Here we are at the end of 10 years having another influenza epidemic, and to our amazement are told that no progress whatever has been made in the study of this disease since 1918 and practically none for a quarter of a century.

COLOSSAL ECONOMIC WASTE OF SICKNESS

A great many Senators wish to know where the financial benefit is going to come in with regard to legislation. Entirely apart from the inconvenience, suffering, and sorrow, what an economic loss the Nation's health bill represents—inefficiency in work, absenteeism from daily duties, prolonged stays in hospitals, expense of medical treatment, a tremendous loss from the productive capacity of our citizenry when interpreted in money terms—as has been so clearly demonstrated by Dr. Louis I. Dublin, chief statistician of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. Three estimates of the annual repair bill of the human frames of our citizens, namely, the cost of medical service, have been made. Doctor Dublin estimates about $1,000,000,000, Doctor Herty about $1,015,000,000, while the Red Cross estimates $60 per family annually, which is the equivalent of practically $1,500,000,000. To this great amount must be added further loss from wages, and so forth, amounting to at least $2,000,000,000, and finally some six billion dollars as representing the financial value of the lives lost through premature death from preventable diseases. Certainly the loss from those sicknesses which at present we do not know how to control represents on a conservative basis at least an equal amount. We thus reach figures of startling magnitude—$15,000,000,000 a year—far exceeding losses from floods and all other national disasters combined, and these are annual losses. If they are to be reduced, the only sure road is that of scientific research with its results vigorously applied.

NO NEW BUREAU OF GOVERNMENT CONTEMPLATED

I wish to emphasize the fact that under my bill no new bureau of the Government is contemplated. It simply enlarges and broadens the scope of work now being conducted by the United States Public Health Service. The health activities of individuals, medical schools, hospitals, scientific institutions, and State departments of health will not be interfered with, but, on the contrary, aided materially by the proposed institute. The State health officers throughout the Nation are heartily in favor of the bill. Disease does not recognize State or National boundaries. When cancer hits it does not consider State lines. When tuberculosis strikes it does not know north, south, east, or west. The bill provides for research of all diseases affecting the human race. It makes provision for pure research into the cause, prevention, and cure of every disease, and seeks to place the best and newest methods and discoveries in the hands of our physicians and public-health authorities.

Section 5 provides that—

The facilities of the institute shall from time to time be made available to bona fide health authorities of States, counties, or municipalities for purposes of instruction and investigation.

CAN THE CAUSE AND MEANS OF PREVENTING DISEASE BE DISCOVERED?

Some one may ask, "What hope have you that a national institute of health will enable American scientists to discover the causes of diseases and offer a remedy therefor?" In reply let me state that the foundation of human progress is the genius of individuals crystalized in the form of new discoveries. Before the days of Hippocrates, the father of medicine, men had sought to prevent the outbreaks of disease which threatened to, and frequently did, overwhelm them. During the Middle Ages the scourges of leprosy, plague, cholera, and smallpox compelled the attention of thoughtful men. Eventually man perceived that without definite knowledge of the source of disease, especially its cause and mode of spread, he was without prospect of discovering the means of its prevention. The recital of the search for and finding of these fundamental facts is the history of preventive medicine; and their practical application is the history of public-health work. Let me cite several examples:

TEXAS FEVER

In 1889 Dr. Theobald Smith, of this country, discovered that Texas fever in cattle is caused by the bite of a tick—a small insect—which had previously become infected. This was a monumental advance in the science of health, as it demonstrated that a terrible disease could be given to cows and other lower animals by the bite of a little insect. Who could say that the sickness of human animals was not caused by insect bites?

MALARIA

The parasite which causes malaria was discovered in 1880, but it was not until about 1897 that Ronald Ross, of England, and Battista Grassi, of Italy, ascertained how the malaria parasite gets into the blood of man. Through their studies it was shown that the Anopheles mosquito was the means whereby the malaria parasite was spread from person to person. The development of methods of attack on malaria soon followed this discovery, and the application of this knowledge by public-health authorities has been successful in ridding large areas of malaria infection.

YELLOW FEVER

Shortly after the discovery of the malaria parasite it was demonstrated, in 1898, that the stegomia mosquito was the carrier of yellow fever. Probably no brighter light illumines the high road of public health than that which marks the passing of "yellow jack." To three American scientists—Reed, Carroll, and Lazear—the world owes this important discovery. To those who remember the appalling epidemics of only a generation or two ago and the panics which they produced this achievement seems little short of miraculous. Yellow fever has not been epidemic in the United States since 1905, and very little of it remains on earth.

HOOKWORM

About 22 years ago another parasitic disease—hookworm—was run to its lair in the United States by Doctor Stiles of the Public Health Service, and in Porto Rico by Doctor Ashford of the Army, who made extremely interesting discoveries in regard to it, though the disease in somewhat different form was fairly well known in the Old World. They developed methods of prevention and cure. This disease affected literally millions of human beings throughout the world and so lowered their vitality they were unable to work effectively, and fell ready victims to other maladies. Much credit is due to the Rockefeller Foundation for eradicating this sickness to a great extent from our country and other lands. It has been practically conquered in the United States and there is no longer any excuse for an intelligent person to suffer from it.

PELLAGRA

A vast new field was opened when Dr. Joseph Goldberger discovered that the terrible disease known as pellagra is caused by a defective diet, not by a lack of food, but by an unbalanced ration, and that no parasite has connection with it. This discovery, and the many years of study connected therewith, has saved the lives of hundreds of thousands and set the pace for limitless research on the effect of diet upon human health.

Let me add that this great man, Dr. Joseph Goldberger, died within the past three weeks, a victim of the wonderful work for the benefit of humanity to which he had devoted himself for the past 27 years. If ever there was a genuine martyr to science it was Joseph Goldberger.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STECK in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. COPELAND. I trust the Senate will not forget what the Senator has said about Doctor Goldberger. There is pending in the Senate certain relief legislation which should be given the serious attention of Senators. What Doctor Goldberger contributed to humanity has been worth millions to the United States of America and he was indeed, as the Senator said, a true martyr to science.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator.

NATIONAL LEPROSARIUM

In my State, at a small town called Carville, the United States Public Health Service is showing the world how to combat and defeat leprosy, the "living death" that has existed since 1500 B. C. Because of the public attitude of fear and horror toward leprosy, there was great difficulty in locating the institution on this continent, but Louisiana, which had long maintained an excellent State home for lepers, met the situation by transferring its institution to the Government. I had the honor of introducing and securing passage of a law in 1917, providing a national leprosarium, and appropriating $250,000 for that purpose. The State leper home at Carville, on the Mississippi River, about 40 miles below Baton Rouge, was acquired from Louisiana in 1917. By 1923 this leper home had been filled to capacity, a total of 173 beds being occupied. In that year Congress appropriated $650,000 for additional buildings with which to increase the bed capacity to approximately 500. At the close of the fiscal year, June 30, 1928, there were 293 patients in the institution, and 11 were discharged on parole during that year with their disease arrested, if not entirely cured. For the first six months of the present fiscal year, 14 were paroled. Of the 42 patients paroled, in seven years prior to the present fiscal year, only 1 has had to return for further treatment.

These six examples illustrate the marvelous progress that the science of health has made within the past 50 years. I could cite many other instances but do not care to go into a general discussion of this matter.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. I dislike exceedingly to interfupt the Senator.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator's interruptions are so very fine and he is contributing so much that I am delighted to have him interrupt.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is very kind in saying that. I want to say, in connection with the work relating to leprosy and the establishment of the institution in Louisiana, that it was a real contribution to every city and State in the Union. At the time of the opening of the institution in Louisiana we were maintaining a somewhat similar institution in the city of New York for the care of 18 lepers. We had to mantain a separate institution, really a hospital, to care for this limited number of persons; and yet public sentiment demanded, of course, that they should be taken care of and kept from mingling with the public. When the institution was opened in Louisiana we transferred those 18 lepers to that institution. If time permitted it would be amusing to tell of the difficulties our doctors and nurses had in taking the patients through to Louisiana. The fear of the public was so great that even the conductor of the train would not go through to get their tickets to indicate that the passengers were really aboard. He was willing to take anybody's word for it. The fear of our people has been overcome and a decent place provided for the care of those patients. The Senator deserves the thanks of the entire country for having succeeded in getting the appropriation for the institution.

As the Senator said, by a concentrated effort at this point and in the Philippines, where we have a similar institution, there has been developed a real cure for leprosy, and these persons, or a great many of them, will be returned to their homes as perfectly safe members of society, to add to the economic wealth of the country by reason of their cure.

I trust the Senator will forgive me for interrupting him.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator for the interruption. I wish to add to what he said that in the State of Massachusetts, near Boston, on Penikese Island, there was a State home for lepers when this national institution was established. In one of the big hospitals in San Francisco there was a special lepers' ward; and according to the testimony given before the Committee on Public Health during the hearings on that leprosarium bill, it was said that there were at least 2,500 lepers in the United States.

I hold in my hand a very interesting statement by my friend Dr. C. P. Munday, one of the physicians at the National Leprosarium, which I shall ask to print as a part of my remarks. In it he said there are in the world to-day probably 2,000,000 lepers, and about 2,000 in the United States. We are taking care of 293 in the home at Carville, and I imagine that every one of the 2,000 in the United States ought to be cared for.

Senators, let me say that the most interesting day of my life was spent about three years ago when I visited the Carville Leprosarium as the guest of my friend Doctor Dowling, then the head of the Public Health Service of Louisiana. I went among these people in the institution and talked to them. Each one occupied a separate room and everything possible was being done to make their sad condition possible. Their rooms were well furnished, their food was excellent, they had good nursing, and the best of medical attention. They had their baseball park, two churches served by ministers of their faith, their band of music—in fact, everything possible was being done by our great country for these unfortunates. It was the most beautiful charity I ever witnessed, and I was proud of the fact that I was a man after going there and seeing what was being done by our great Government to relieve the awful sufferings of leprosy.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. On what terms are patients admitted to the leprosarium?

Mr. RANSDELL. They are taken there absolutely as the guests of the Government. No charge whatsoever is made, and there is no distinction as to race, color, or previous condition. "Are you a suffering human being? Have you leprosy?" That is all. "We take you in and we keep you until you die or are cured."

Mr. SHEPPARD. Are there any arrangements made to defray the transportation charges from the home of the patient to the leprosarium?

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not answer that question, but think such arrangements are made.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I read just recently that there has been discovered a cure for leprosy and that lepers are being cured; in fact, that the leper, John Early, has been cured by the injection of oil into his system.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator from Alabama. It is chaulmoogra oil. John Early has actually been discharged and cured. He is living at his home in North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is true. He came home recently and gave out an interview with reference to the matter which the Senator from Louisiana is discussing.

Mr. RANSDELL. In the last seven years they have discharged 42 persons as cured, and only 1 had to be returned for further treatment. After they are discharged, they are placed on parole, and examined from time to time for three years.

I will now read a little human interest item from the statement of Doctor Munday in regard to the leprosarium. He said:

One bright Sunday morning late last summer eight of the patients at Carville, the largest number paroled at one time in the 34 years of the colony's history, packed their simple belongings, made their religious devotion, bade their gallant colony friends farewell, and began a joyous little procession of departure. One who had come as a young girl 33 years before, who had been away but one short week in those long near-hopeless years, turned aside to say farewell words to the medical officer in charge. She bore scars of a brave fight against relentless disease, but her face held a light of joy no actress could hope to simulate, as she tried vainly to make mere words express her gratitude. In the lines of Father Ryan, poet-priest of the Southland, many times she had "shrouded her griefs in a smile"; but now at the moment of victory, she "wept when her heart was the gladdest." Then she rejoined the others as they went around the little chapel, over the lawn, under the drooping moss-fringed live oaks, to the waiting friends of the outside world.

Senators, I have been in Congress nearly 30 years and have worked hard, but I can say in all sincerity that during all those years no legislation with which I have been connected has given me so much personal satisfaction as my bill which established this leprosarium.

Mr. COPELAND. At the same time the Senator contributed vastly to the public health and to the good of the entire country.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator. I now wish to insert Doctor Munday's article as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement follows:

THE CARVILLE LEPROSARIUM

By Dr. C. P. Munday

Leprosy, from Biblical times, has been the disease abhorrent. The leper has been an outcast, subjected to neglect and indignities which, added to the inherent miseries and mutilations, made him the most pitiable creature God could let live upon His earth.

From the early centuries of the Christian era leprosy scourged its way through Europe, reaching its height at the time of the crusades, which added to its spread, there being early in the thirteenth century fully 20,000 leprosaria in Europe. These were, in fact, little more than human kennels. However, the segregation which they secured was followed by a gradual decrease until leprosy has practically disappeared from Europe. But its subsidence was followed by appearance in the colonies of the Americas, islands of the Indian and Pacific Oceans, in the Far East, and Africa. Existing mainly in tropical and subtropical zones, there are at present probably 2,000,000 lepers in the world to-day.

The necessity for Federal control and care of the lepers in the continental United States was recognized for a generation or more, but it was only seven years ago that it was begun under the Public Health Service, and its work toward this end has been one of its outstanding accomplishments. Louisiana had established a leper colony in 1894, and its difficulty in finding a site not obnoxious to the adjacent community was paralleled during four years by the Federal Government, which solved the problem of location of a national leprosarium by taking over the Louisiana colony, with its 80 patients, in 1921. There has been developed on the tract of 358 acres at Carville on the Mississippi River an institution which is taking adequate care of over 300 lepers at present. There are between one and two thousand in the United States for which such care should be provided.

The policy of the Public Health Service has been to educate the public to a better, saner knowledge of the facts of leprosy and its control; to prevent as far as possible further spread of the disease; to give every needed physical, medical, and even spiritual aid to the segregated patients, that as many as possible may be restored to health and released as no longer a menace to public health; to make the leprosarium not a place for lepers to be driven to as diseased criminals under life sentence, but rather a beautiful place of residence to which they may come with hope, with only such isolation and detention as protection of public health may require.

Development of the plant at Carville has required a total expenditure of approximately $1,000,000, with a present annual administrative cost of $375,000, which is about $3.50 per diem cost per patient.

That this general policy is succeeding is shown by the yearly increase in admissions, the decrease in number of patients absconding, most of whom return voluntarily, and lastly, by progressive increase in the number of patients who are being paroled as no longer a menace to public health. After such parole each patient is examined at least semiannually for three years before final discharge is given. Of the 42 patients who have been so paroled in seven years, only 1 has had to return for further treatment. For the fiscal year ending June, 1928, there were 11 paroles, but for the first six months of the present fiscal year the number was 14; and there are a larger number whose progress promises release by the end of June of this year.

Restoration to health, return to home and loved ones, under ordinary conditions of life may well bring joy to anyone. But picture, if you can, what both restoration and release may mean to one of these unfortunates.

One bright Sunday morning late last summer eight of the patients at Carville, the largest number paroled at one time in the 34 years of the colony's history, packed their simple belongings, made their religious devotions, bade their gathered colony friends farewell, and began a joyous little procession of departure.

One, who had come as a young girl, 33 years before, who had been away but one short week in those long, near-hopeless years, turned aside to say a farewell word to the medical officer in charge. She bore scars of a brave fight against relentless disease, but her face held a light of joy no actress could hope to simulate as she tried vainly to make mere words express her gratitude. In the lines of Father Ryan, poet-priest of the Southland, many times she had "shrouded her griefs in a smile," but now, at the moment of victory, she "wept when her heart was the gladdest." Then she rejoined the others as they went around the little chapel, over the lawn, under the drooping, moss-fringed live oaks, to the waiting friends of the outside world.

Mr. RANSDELL. Before resuming the trend of my remarks, I wish to refer to a statement made by Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, well known to all of us. He spoke in the most eloquent terms about the remarkable service of Doctor Gorgas.

He says that the construction of the Panama Canal by the French was prevented by yellow fever; that its story may be told in two words—"yellow fever"—and that to Gorgas rather than to Goethals the principal honor of constructing that wonderful work is due. I do not know but that he is right. I have often said, and so stated when visiting that great work shortly after it was started, that the big problem we had to solve was that of health. We had to destroy malaria and yellow fever before the engineers and workmen could safely throw dirt. Doctor Wiley also refers to Walter Reed, to Joseph Goldberger, to Stiles and McCoy in the United States, and then pays a tribute to Doctor Banting and Doctor Osler, of Canada. I ask to publish his statement without further reading. Senators who read it will certainly find it extremely interesting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE ADVANCEMENT OF MEDICINE AND HYGIENE ARISING IN THE UNITED STATES AND IN ADJACENT COUNTRIES IN AMERICA

By Dr. Harvey W. Wiley

We do not have far to go for luminous examples of valuable contributions to the nature of disease and the importance of hygiene. If we go back a few years and read the history of the attempt to build the Panama Canal by France, we find an amazing story. There are no better engineers in the world than the French engineers. They had all engineering science at the time the attempt was made to build the canal that any other nation possessed. Why did France fail? Two words give the answer: Yellow fever.

The mortality from this disease and from allied diseases from the same source was appalling. The path of the canal was dotted with the graves of engineers and laborers. Finally, the attempt was abandoned.

When the United States decided to build the canal, what happened? The cause of yellow fever had become well known. We did not send Colonel Goethals to the front, but Colonel Gorgas. His duty was to make the path of the Panama Canal safe for workers. He did one of the greatest works in destroying the mosquitoes and in safeguarding life and health that ever had been done for a proposed engineering campaign. Colonel Gorgas may be said to have built the canal rather than Colonel Goethals. His memory and his fame are forever safe in the hearts of his countrymen.

As one of the conquerors of yellow fever Walter Reed will ever be remembered. It has been my good fortune to pay a visit to the humble home in which Walter Reed was born, not far from Yorktown but on this side of the river where our liberty and freedom as a Nation was finally established. This home has been bought by the American Medical Association for the purpose of making it the mecca where devoted members of the medical profession as well as other citizens may go and worship.

Coming now particularly to the Hygienic Laboratory which it is proposed to designate hereafter as the National Institute of Health, we have this day (January 17, 1929) witnessed the death of the great discoverer of pellagra, its cause and cure, Dr. Joseph Goldberger, who died a victim of a complicated, malignant disease. He saved hundreds of thousands of people from the miseries of pellagra only to sacrifice his own life in the pursuit of benefits for others.

Dr. Charles Wardell Stiles has done more than any other one person in this country to rid the South of the curse of hookworm. In season, out of season, he has stood guard over the health and consequent happiness of sufferers of this disease.

Dr. G. W. McCoy has been the leader in developing a powerful serum, much more efficient than any that has yet been devised, for the control of pneumonia. The use of serum bids fair to mark a new era in the mortality of this disease which will be materially lessened.

The researches in the new factors of health, namely, vitamins, which have been conducted by so many devoted students and research chemists in this country have made it possible to understand the importance of these elements to health and have connected them directly with vitamin-like bodies that come to us in the rays of the sun and particularly in the form of antirachitic prevention. Each particular vitamin seems to have a favorite disease which it endeavors to control. The vitamin known as A prevents sore eyes, or dry eye, and also exerts a powerful influence on preventing respiratory diseases, thus giving additional control over pneumonia and pleurisy.

The vitamin known as B appears to be like a double star. One part of it projects against beri-beri or polyneuritis; another gives aid in combatting pellagra, thus adding additional value to the services of the late Doctor Goldberger.

The vitamin known as C, which has received most extensive studies in this country, is particularly useful in the prevention of scurvy.

There is another vitamin, which may be denominated D, which seems to exercise a beneficent control in the way of promoting fertility.

And so, with all of these researches going on, we need some central coordinating authority to direct and promote in the most effective way researches in the interest of better health and longer life of our people.

In addition to our own workers thus briefly summarized, we have had valuable help from our neighbors. Especially from Cuba, Mexico, and Canada valuable assistance has been offered us in the way of better health and longer life.

The Cuban workers were very active in offering their services in the cause of yellow fever. Aid was also extended from Mexico. From Canada we have the investigations which have resulted in the discovery of insulin, and the general distribution thereof from the great slaughter houses in this country. For some reason the pancreas is not a very popular article of food, and it is in the pancreas that they are found in the islands of Langerhans, from which insulin is secured. I believe that the pancreases of pigs are used most extensively for this purpose, though the organs of other meat animals are perhaps nearly as good a source of supply. To Banting and his colaborers in the University of Toronto we owe this precious gift. We ought not to forget also that we presented, first from Canada and then from Johns Hopkins Hospital, Doctor Osler to the University of Oxford, where he became regius professor of medicine. Doctor Osler is recognized at least as the peer if not the superior of any modern physician within recent years.

LIBERAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR ANIMAL AND PLANT DISEASES

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, the Federal Government has been very liberal in appropriating funds for conducting work in the investigation and control of diseases of animals and of plants. It appears from a table prepared by the Bureau of Animal Industry that for the fiscal years 1925 to 1929, inclusive, the sum of $30,011,609 has been available for the eradication of scabies in sheep, cattle ticks, hog cholera, dourine, European fowl pests, and for the investigation of sundry animal diseases. The table contained no figures for eradicating the foot-and-mouth disease, but I understand that six millions were expended in that special work in 1924. While I have no table showing the amounts of major appropriations to combat plant diseases and pests for the same years—1925 to 1929—a tabular summary furnished me by the Congressional Library shows that for the 5-year period 1923 to 1927, $24,241,846 was appropriated to fight the diseases of plants. In other words, in five years the Government appropriated $54,253,455 to combat the diseases of animals and plants, while during the 5-year period 1925 to 1929, inclusive, the expenditures for scientific research of public-health problems amounted to only $3,918,019.37. In other words, we appropriated $1 to conserve and protect the health of human beings to $13.50 for the same work for the lower animals and plants. That is the way we have been treating human life, Senators.

In the case of animals and plants the lawmaker was confronted with the selfish insistence of agriculturists whose very existence depended on the health of animals and plants. This problem was a most important economic one, and it was entirely proper to appropriate whatever sums were necessary to fight the enemies of animals and plants. There were no special interests to look after the diseases of human beings and press for legislation thereon, hence these insignificant appropriations of less than four millions in five years for man, as compared with fifty-four millions for animals and plants—one dollar to thirteen and a half.

The economic question evidently influences these liberal amounts for the protection of property—livestock and crops—but is not a far greater economic question involved in conserving the health and happiness of human beings? Doctor Dublin estimated in 1922 that the total national wealth of the United States in assets or property was valued at three hundred and twenty-one billions, inclusive of real property, livestock, machinery, agricultural and mining products, and manufactured goods of all sorts, while the value of our vital assets, men and women combined, was one trillion five hundred billions. Our vital capital therefore exceeded our material wealth about 5 to 1.

Surely if it were wise to expend fifty-four millions to protect from disease our plants and animals—only a small part of our national property assets—it would be proper to spend at least that much to care for our vital assets which aggregate in value five times as much as all our property assets combined. And when I say "value" I do not take into consideration the question of the suffering of human beings from disease, nor the wonderful value of the happiness that comes from good health.

Mr. President, I have shown that the losses from sickness and premature death caused by diseases is fifteen billions a year. And beyond question much of this awful economic destruction would be saved by such an institute of health as my bill proposes.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

Mr. RANSDELL. I am glad to do so.

Mr. COPELAND. Is it not remarkable that a man at the onset of some ailment will fail to do anything for himself, will let it run along as it will, and, perhaps, take his life because of neglect, but if he has a sick animal that is worth $40 he will hire a veterinarian and stay up four nights in succession to keep it alive?

Mr. RANSDELL. It is certainly remarkable.

Mr. COPELAND. We are prone to conserve and protect our property interests, but when it comes to the preservation of human health and life then we are not willing to expend money.

Mr. RANSDELL. We appreciate the economic value of health in the case of animals, but we do not have the sense to appreciate it in regard to human beings.

Mr. COPELAND. It is true of the individual, it is true of the family, and it is true of the Government, that we will spend money to protect property, but when it comes to human health and life we forget all about our interest in humanity.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. KING. The Senator is delivering an interesting and instructive address. Throughout the world the people are interested in eradicating disease and promoting human welfare. That progress is being made is apparent to all. In the United States can be found a body of physicians and surgeons of skill and ability. Many of them are addressing themselves with zeal and earnestness to their professional duties, and are also doing a vast amount of research work for the purpose of discovering the causes of human ailments and maladies and remedies for the same.

The extensive character of the work being done by our scientific men is not fully appreciated, and the research work which is being done in our colleges, universities, and public and private institutions is far beyond the comprehension of most people. I think the Senator has, not intentionally, overlooked the scientific developments in our own country along medical and health lines, and the work which is being done to reach the objective sought by the Senator. The lives of the people are being prolonged; the causes of many ailments are being discovered and remedies are being found to meet the ravages of numerous diseases.

The Senator refers to the small amount expended by the Federal Government for medical purposes. I invite his attention to the fact that we have a dual form of government and that the States have responsibilities and obligations which are not within the purview of the Federal Government. I know there is a tide which seems irresistible which is sweeping the States into the powerful grasp of the Federal Government and a Federal bureaucracy. Appeals are constantly being made for the Federal Government to take over the functions of the State and to assume those duties which clearly devolve upon the States and their political subdivisions.

Mr. President, there is no reasonable ground for complaint because of the limited amount which has been expended by the Federal Government in a number of important fields. The physicians and surgeons and medical and scientific men who are devoting themselves to hygiene and sanitation and the alleviation of the sufferings and sorrows of the people is truly remarkable. Millions are annually being expended by the States and their political subdivisions in the interest of public health.

I think it can be said that in every county of every State of the Union there will be found one or more organizations devoted to the promotion of public health and the elimination of disease. The States, counties, and municipalities are spending enormous sums annually to promote public health. Clinics are being established and hospitals are being erected. Health organizations are being effected and everywhere the subject of prolonging life and preserving health is receiving earnest and intelligent consideration.

I pay tribute to the achievements of our medical men. The Rockefeller Foundation is doing work of the highest importance. The University of Chicago and the Northwestern University, Johns Hopkins University, the University of Pennsylvania, and many others are not only preparing thousands of young men for the medical profession but they are doing much research work that is superior to that done in Government laboratories and Government organizations in this and other countries.

Senators will recall the work of a great Japanese doctor whose untimely death the world deplores. His work in one of our universities brought him world-wide fame. I could mention the names of many eminent physicians and surgeons who have achieved distinction in their professions, and who have made most important contributions to, if I may be permitted the expression, the scientific development of medicine. Mr. President, governmental agencies too often stifle progress. The tendency of all bureaus is toward standardization and uniformity. Everything must be stereotyped and it is rather infrequent for genius to be developed in the atmosphere of bureaucracy. Pasteur and other great scientists were not handicapped by bureaucracy.

Of course, every Senator is interested in promoting health and in the discovery of the causes of human ailments and the remedies for the same; and it is possible that the measure offered by the Senator may accomplish good and be justified under all the circumstances. I am making these observations rather to meet what I conceived to be the implication arising from the Senator's remarks that a Federal organization was imperatively needed to meet the situation; as well as the implication that there had been insufficient attention given by the people of the United States to the matter of public health.

Mr. President, millions are being contributed annually by individuals interested in the welfare of the people and for scientific investigations and for educational development. The words "social welfare" have taken on a new meaning during the past few years, and thousands of the best citizens of the United States are giving of their time and their means to social service; to the promotion of public health; to the development in every way of the people of this Republic. The increase in the number of hospitals has been one of the marvels of the day. In every part of our country the finest hospitals are being erected and there is being brought within the reach of the people those instrumentalities important for their health and well-being. I have confidence in the States; in the people within the States; in the medical, professional, and the scientific men of our country. We need not go to Europe to train our medical men or to find scientists for important research work connected with the most vital and important things of life.

If the Federal Government is to be projected into this field there must be care that Federal bureaucracy shall not place a deadening hand upon the activities of the people and the fine spirit of service which is manifested by the States and their various political subdivisions.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. The difference between the care that is taken of the health of animals and of human beings, to which the Senator from Louisiana has referred, is illustrated by a story that Woodrow Wilson was in the habit of telling, I understand, about his own father. His father was a Presbyterian divine. He drove up on one occasion behind a horse in his buggy to a country store, and one of his neighbors at that country store said to him, "How is it, Doctor, that your horse looks so sleek and fat and you look so thin and poorly?" "Why," he said, "that is because I take care of my horse and my congregation takes care of me." [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is perfectly consistent, because what he has said about the pending bill is exactly what he would say about the bureaucracy of the Agricultural Department and other bureaus and organizations now established in Washington. I assume I am right in that statement. I recognize the merit of much that he says. I, too, am a Democrat, and recognize that the States should be left to do many things which some persons who take a different view of political economy feel should be turned over to the Federal Government. There can be no doubt, however, that what the Senator from Louisiana has in mind is no invasion whatever of the rights, the responsibilities, or the duties of the States. They are expected to continue their activities; but there are many forms of research referred to by the Senator from Utah—and I am sorry that I have not his attention at the moment—there are many forms of research going on, work done by private physicians, which are terribly hampered because of the bread-and-butter problem.

Many a man who has scientific knowledge, knowledge which could be applied to the benefit of the human race, is used wholly for the cure of a very limited number of individuals, because this doctor must make a living. He must keep the wolf from the door. He is interrupted in his research, his activities which have widespread use, because he has to make a living. If that man who has an aptitude for research work can be put somewhere where he can use all of his time, it stands to reason that he will push out the boundaries of knowledge, and increase our information as to the cause and prevention of disease. One of the things I like about the bill of the Senator from Louisiana is that if these funds are provided from private sources or otherwise they may be used to take care of just such a physician or scientist as the Senator from Utah referred to, and take the bread-and-butter problem away from him in order that he may devote himself exclusively to this one thing.

The Senator from Utah referred to the attitude of the profession, to the work done by individuals and the work done in the medical societies. The Senator from Louisiana has back of his bill the hearty indorsement of every medical body in this country——

Mr. RANSDELL. That is true.

Mr. COPELAND. Because these doctors, either as individuals or as members of these various medical societies, realize that it is impossible to do this work without a theater of operation and without the facilities necessary to carry on the work. I doubt if any bill has come to the Senate since I have been a Member of it to which there was so little opposition, and on the contrary such enthusiastic indorsement, as we find here from all the learned societies, from the medical profession and all the professions allied with medicine, from every university, from every laboratory, publicly or privately endowed, from every great research worker, and from everybody who has an interest in the prevention of disease.

So I do not think the criticism or the suggestion offered by the Senator from Utah applies forcefully to the matter before us, because these very men that he talks about are unable to do the work necessary to accomplish some great thing for humanity for the reason that they have not the time or the facilities to carry it on. So I feel that the Senator need not be disturbed about the attitude of any single physician or of the profession generally. All concerned are interested in the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator, and wish to say that among all the doctors in the United States and all these other scientists and all the institutions of various kinds I have heard of only two physicians—and they are partners—who seem to be opposed to this bill.

It has received practically the unanimous indorsement of the medical profession of this country. Now I am going to go somewhat into detail. I am glad the Senator from Utah has come back. I will read a few of these points, and then take up some of the testimony for the benefit of the Senator. I am glad he is here, and I am pleased he has asked that question. He is a sincere, honest investigator. It is necessary to prove to him that a thing is right, and then he will back it as strongly as any man in this body, but will not do so unless he does know from his own investigations that it is right.

PUBLIC OPINION STRONGLY FAVORS THE MEASURE

Public opinion is crystallizing strongly in favor of this bill. The report of the Senate Commerce Committee thereon is unanimous. In April of last year the committee held hearings on it; and among the prominent witnesses who testified in its favor were Drs. Reid Hunt, of Harvard; Treat Johnson, of Yale; Herty, of New York; McCormack, of Kentucky; Camalier, of Washington, D. C.; and E. E. Kelly, secretary of the American Pharmaceutical Association.

Many leading physicians have indorsed the measure by letter, including Doctors Barker, of Baltimore; Winslow, of Yale; Rosenau, of Harvard; Howell and Abel, of Johns Hopkins; Emerson, of Columbia; William J. Mayo, of Rochester, Minn.; Oscar Dowling, Joseph A. Danna, E. P. Lowe, Rudolph Matas, of Louisiana; Joseph A. O'Hara, president of Louisiana State Board of Health; Frederick L. Hoffman, of the Prudential Insurance Co.; Harvey W. Wiley, of Washington, D. C.; Carl Asiberg, of Stanford University; Julius Stieglitz, of the University of Chicago; A. J. Goldfarb, of the Society for Experimental Biology and Medicine; W. W. Keene, of Philadelphia, a physician 92 years of age, and at that great age he is president of the American Philosophical Society; Clarence K. Simon, of the Dye Products & Chemical Co., New York; and Herman Bundesen, commissioner of health of Chicago; also Messrs. Francis P. Garvan, president of the Chemical Foundation, New York; L. W. Wallace, executive secretary of the American Engineering Council; Roger Caldwell, of Nashville, Tenn.; Ray Lyman Wilbur, president of Stanford University; E. T. Bedford, president Corn Products Refining Co., New York; and James L. Fieser, vice chairman of the American Red Cross; also the Rotary Club of Wilmington, Del., and the Calco Chemical Co. of New Jersey.

It has been a source of real pleasure to have the backing of my bill by several influential organizations such as the Chemical Foundation, which through Doctor Herty has cooperated with me wonderfully from the very inception of the measure, the Rockefeller Foundation, the National Research Council, and the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.

During the past year cordial resolutions of indorsement have been adopted by the American Chemical Society, the American Medical Association, the American Public Health Association, the American Institute of the City of New York, the American Dental Association, the American Pharmaceutical Association, and the International Society for Crippled Children.

Moreover, the press of the country, especially in the East, has unqualifiedly urged the passage of this bill. I ask the especial attention of Senators to this point: A fine editorial supporting it which appeared in the New York Times of January 27, 1929, published in the RECORD on the 31st, called attention to the fact that King George, of England, had been saved during his recent severe illness by the concentrated efforts of the physician, surgeon, bacteriologist, biochemist, physiologist, X-ray physicist, and climatologist. What this measure contemplates is such a concentration of efforts by scientists as will prevent anyone from contracting the terrible sickness which nearly caused the death of the King.

Mr. KING. It is wonderful that he survived so many doctors.

Mr. RANSDELL. They were not doctors. He had only one or two doctors, but all these other scientists. He was able to bring to his aid these specialists; but the average person can not do so. How can a poor man bring all these scientists around him? He is lucky if he can get one doctor. We must prevent the recurrence of such a disease; or, if that is impossible, then we must ascertain how it can be cured.

Coming specifically to the query—the very intelligent query, I will say—of the Senator from Utah, I wish to say, first, that no man appreciates more than I do the wonderful work in a scientific and health way that has been conducted throughout this country by our individual physicians, our hospitals, our scientific and educational institutions of every kind and sort; and I am happy to tell the Senator that these individuals and these institutions almost to a man are back of my bill. I can not read all their indorsements, but wish to read perhaps three or four to answer the question of the Senator from Utah.

I read from page 35 of the hearings on the bill the testimony of Dr. Treat Johnson, professor of organic chemistry at Yale University, recognized as one of the greatest scientists in America. This was the question:

Senator RANSDELL. Will you not elaborate a little bit, Doctor, on what you think coordinated effort on the part of our Government should be to bring about better results than have been obtained by private institutions, even your own great college? How would science of every kind, not only of life, of human beings, but the laws relating to animals and plants and everything in relation to human life, how will the establishment of the bureau of health produce better results than have been obtained in the past by private efforts?

That is practically the question asked by the Senator from Utah. He says:

That is a very broad question, Mr. Senator.

Senator RANSDELL. I intended it to be, but I think we had better try to answer it.

Doctor JOHNSON. It can be answered in sections. I would like to answer it by presenting my reply in the form of different statements.

Senator RANSDELL. Answer in your own way, Professor.

Doctor JOHNSON. Now, in the first place, I think we all should understand or do understand that we have a great many problems to be solved that the present resources can not be expected to undertake and handle, and as we go into research, and research grows and extends, the problems multiply, and that our resources must be expanded. Now, as we have expansion, as these problems begin to be exploited and studied, it calls for close coordination in order to be able to focus on the features of your research problems, which are of the greatest importance. In other words, I think there is a quite general feeling that a little of the work that is being done now is perhaps duplication, simply because of the fact that we have no machinery, no organization under central control—

Please listen to that, Senators:

No organization under central control where these various efforts and activities can be brought together, and we can have a council around a table like this, and all these activities can be focused and direction given to the best efforts of the research.

Senator COPELAND then asked:

Would there be any conflict between the various private agencies and this governmental institution?

Doctor Johnson replied:

I do not see how there could be. I am not very familiar, Senator COPELAND, with the machinery of control in Government circles.

That was the testimony of Doctor Johnson. I will now read the testimony of Dr. Reid Hunt. He is the head of the department of pharmacology of Harvard University Medical School and is recognized as a great scientist. He said in regard to the laboratory:

I think it is almost certain that gifts would come. I can speak as an outsider. The Hygienic Laboratory here has the reputation of being an extraordinarily successful and useful institution; and I know that it is the feeling around many universities, etc., that money goes much further in the Hygienic Laboratory than almost any other place in the country when it comes to research in these subjects.

Now I wish to read briefly from a statement made by Dr. Julius Stieglitz, professor and chairman of the department of chemistry of the University of Chicago, certainly one of the best-known and honored among our American scientific men. He said:

Universities and certain research institutions often have all of the above branches of science strongly represented in their staffs—

That is, the various branches represented by the doctors and surgeons I have mentioned. I will not call their names again—but except in the rarest of cases there is no intensive cooperative attack on a single problem by all these scientists working together.

What this bill contemplates, Senators, is a united, well-directed effort, let us say as against cancer, bringing everyone we can from everywhere in the world who knows anything about cancer, or thinks he knows anything about cancer, enabling us to run that terrible disease to its lair. If it takes one year, well and good; if it is 10 years, all right; if there is 50 years of this concentrated effort along one line, it will be wise. That is not done now in any of our institutions.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I will yield to the Senator, but I would like to finish the reading of the statement of Doctor Stieglitz. He said further:

There is rather scattering of effort on different problems in which the individual men are individually interested. Conferences and incidental advice and exchange of ideas no doubt are helpful in such institutions, but the fact remains that united attack on a given problem as the major interest of leading men in the several sciences involved is of the rarest occurrence, if it occurs at all.

That corroborates what the Senator from New York has said; they do not concentrate on one thing. It is a wonderfully good effort, and great results have come from it; but they do not mass their forces under one leader, as the allied armies in the World War were marshaled under Foch, and we all know that we did not defeat the Germans until we named one great leader to handle our forces. I propose in this institute of health one leader, massing all the scientists in concentrated, persistent efforts against the various diseases that are brought before them. But not all diseases at once; they will pick out a few and conquer them, then try to conquer others.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. In this connection I should like to reply further to the Senator from Utah. He spoke about what is being done by the various universities. Medical education has become tremendously expensive. The standardization of the medical colleges has required great investment in laboratories and in the employment of laboratory technicians and experts. I assume that that fact has led the public to believe that these laboratories are used for research work looking to the solution of our problems in health, but that is not the case. These laboratories are used to a very great extent for teaching purposes; to teach the fundamentals in order that the physicians to be may be trained in bacteriology, chemistry, and the allied sciences. But so far as increasing the boundaries of knowledge is concerned, they are not so used.

There are a few individual research workers, but almost nothing of value to the profession generally is coming out of these laboratories, and I say that without the slightest criticism. I was dean of a medical school myself too many years to desire to be critical of the system of medical education. But it is a fact that these laboratories are used for teaching purposes, and not for increasing our knowledge of disease.

Therefore it is, as the Senator from Louisiana has pointed out so well in his remarks, that all these great research workers, all these outstanding scientists from every State in the Union, and the medical societies themselves, are here indorsing the project of the Senator, because he is not proposing to duplicate effort but simply to coordinate effort and to encourage the advancement of knowledge as regards disease.

Mr. RANSDELL. Under this bill there would be absolutely no duplication.

I wish to conclude reading the statement of Doctor Stieglitz and then I will yield to the Senator from Washington. Doctor Stieglitz stated further:

> It is in this direction that the United States Government, through the establishment of a national institute of health, has the unique opportunity to give to our country a new and powerful weapon for attack on the great problems of maintenance of health and cure of disease, which is not duplicated or equaled elsewhere.

There we have the testimony of eminent scientists connected with three of the greatest institutions in America—the medical schools of Harvard, Yale, and the University of Chicago—all indorsing this measure strongly, saying that it will fill a great need.

I now yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber when the Senator began his discussion and perhaps he has already stated what I wanted to know. I want to know something about what the expense to the Government this institution eventually will be.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not know how much it is going to cost. The bill does not specify the amount.

Mr. DILL. I know that.

Mr. RANSDELL. It states, "There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," such sums as may be adequate to carry out the provisions of this act.

I do not think it would matter if it cost a large sum. While the Senator was out, I showed that during the 5-year period prior to 1929 we appropriated and spent on diseases of plants and animals something over $54,000,000. During the same period we appropriated for research investigations into health problems less than $4,000,000. In other words, we appropriated about $1 for investigations of diseases of human beings as against $13.50 for the investigation of plant and animal diseases.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I am going to answer the Senator a little further. There is a provision in this bill which is absolutely unique. It provides:

> The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to accept, unconditionally, on behalf of the United States, gifts, by will or otherwise, for study, investigation, and research in the fundamental problems of the diseases of man and matters pertaining thereto.

Then it goes on to say that this money shall be held in trust and used for that purpose. In regard to the word "fundamental," I might say that all diseases were intended to be covered. "Fundamental" does not belong in the bill. Its other parts show that we are interested in all diseases—not "fundamental diseases," but all of them. That was called to my attention by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], and I am glad he mentioned it. He said he would offer an amendment in regard to that, which I agreed to accept.

We have had a few instances in this country of large benefices from rich people. I cited the case of James Smithson, an Englishman, who gave $550,000 to establish the Smithsonian Institution, which has developed into one of the greatest scientific institutions on earth. I explained that under a very recent law the Library of Congress has been authorized to accept donations, and that $2,000,000 had been received under that authorization.

I can refer the Senator to testimony of some of these witnesses, who say that there are a number of rich people in America who would be delighted to make liberal contributions to this great health cause.

Mr. DILL. If they do not, there is going to be a very heavy burden of expenses to the Government on the part of this institution.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not think it would be very heavy. There would be created no new bureau, no new department. We would simply enlarge the work of the Hygienic Laboratory.

Mr. DILL. If it extends out into the various States in its activities——

Mr. RANSDELL. It will not extend into the States in its various activities, but will permit the States to send their scientists to cooperate with those here. I can not see why the Senator should be so solicitous about the appropriation of a small amount for human health and human happiness when we are so liberal in giving money for the investigation of diseases of animals and plants.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, may I venture to answer in part the question raised by the Senator from Washington as to the expense?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. BAYARD. I think it has appeared—the Senator from Louisiana will bear me out—that the Hygienic Laboratory spends about $600,000 a year. I think the testimony of Surgeon General Cumming shows that.

Mr. RANSDELL. Something like that. This work will go forward gradually, I will say to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. DILL. Of course, it is not expected that this institute can be made of any real value on $600,000 a year.

Mr. RANSDELL. As a matter of course, we expect to enlarge it very much, but we are not going to hurt the Treasury of this great, rich country. We are going to do something to run down disease. The Public Health Service has been remarkably successful with the small appropriations given to it. It has a very fine record of actual accomplishment, and if we will just give it sufficient means, it will have a much better record in the future.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to express my sympathy with the purposes of this bill, which of course are splendid. The argument that has been most frequently used against the Senator's bill to me is this, that there are so many private laboratories and private institutions of a similar nature that are doing this work, that it is unnecessary for the Government to embark on this undertaking, and I would like to hear the Senator in regard to that.

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall answer that in part, and I shall answer it a little further later. I read the testimony of Dr. Treat B. Johnson, of Yale, of Dr. Reid Hunt, of Harvard, and of Doctor Stieglitz, of the University of Chicago, all indorsing this bill absolutely.

I hold in my hand a letter from Dr. George E. Vincent, president of the Rockefeller Foundation, dated the 28th of December last. He said:

> MY DEAR SENATOR RANSDELL: This is in reply to your letter of December 22 in which you report the suggestion in certain quarters—

Very few quarters, I will say, but the query came to me—> that the proposed national institute of health might duplicate the work of certain research institutions and centers of medical teaching and investigation.

That is the very point the Senator from Tennessee raised.

> I am sure that, as a matter of fact, there would be no such duplication or conflict, but only a valuable stimulation of wholesome cooperation and fruitful competition.

I do not see how the English language could make it any stronger, and I know of no man better qualified than Dr. George E. Vincent, head of the wonderful Rockefeller Foundation, to testify.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have known Doctor Vincent for quite a number of years, and I know that he is a very high authority in such matters and his opinion is very valuable.

Mr. RANSDELL. I now want to read a brief letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], chairman of the Commerce Committee, on the 21st of last month. He said:

JANUARY 21, 1929.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Reference is made to S. 4518, which was introduced in the Senate by Senator RANSDELL May 3, 1928. Its provisions are as follows: Enlargement of the Hygienic Laboratory and change of its name to the National Institute of Health; authorization of appropriations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the act; acceptance of gifts to be used for the promotion of research; establishment of fellowships in the institute; appointment of scientists; utilization of the facilities of the institute by health authorities; and utilization by the personnel of the institute of the facilities of other scientific institutions wherever located.

The bill as now prepared does not create any new bureaus or new commissions, but utilizes existing governmental machinery. In reality it provides for orderly enlargement of the Hygienic Laboratory and aims to take advantage of its facilities for the training of scientific workers. In order to be substantial this enlargement will necessarily be gradual, depending on available facilities and the ability to secure properly trained personnel to carry on research.

The provision to create a system of fellowship is one of the most valuable parts of the bill. It will enable the national institute of health to encourage men and women of marked proficiency to devote their lives to the study of diseases of mankind. It will also supply contacts among scientific workers to collect and disseminate knowledge.

I am impressed by the authorization for the unconditional acceptance of bequests for the promotion of research. It should encourage private contributions toward the study of health problems and insure their wise use for the solution of particular problems.

The principles of the bill have been indorsed by the leading scientific societies and many prominent scientists and physicians. These principles are meritorious, and I believe their enactment into law would be highly beneficial in the promotion of research and the saving of life.

It may be added that the Bureau of the Budget advises that the proposed legislation is not in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I should like to reply just a little bit more fully to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am glad to yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. It will be a reply to my question, because I did not express an adverse opinion, of course.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to say that I know the Senator favors anything that has to do with the common welfare. The measure now being discussed by the Senator from Louisiana, which the Senator from Tennessee has not had the pleasure of hearing discussed at length so ably and eloquently, is remarkable in one respect, certainly. It has received the unanimous support and indorsement of every institution, whether State supported or privately endowed, in the country. In the Senator's own State of Tennessee and in every State of the Union, so far as I know, there has been this indorsement. I happened to serve on the subcommittee and listened to the testimony. It is a remarkable thing that, beginning with the American Medical Association, the Dental Association, the Pharmacists' Association, and the various learned societies, followed by the various State medical and allied associations, they have all given their support.

An institution in the Senator's own State of Tennessee, for instance, might be doing some research work along a particular line as regards the solution of the cancer problem. That institution might be a State institution or privately endowed and might reach the end of its financial resources. Then, under the provisions of the bill which the Senator from Louisiana has introduced, aid could be given to the work going on in Tennessee, given under the auspices of the national institute of health, but the work would be done in the State of Tennessee. So the general feeling throughout the country on the part of all persons interested in the matter of public and private health is that they are all in the fullest accord with the measure and are offering it their warmest support.

I wanted to say that to the Senator from Tennessee so he will know there is no opposition from any source, so far as I know.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has it the indorsement of the medical societies of the country?

Mr. COPELAND. Every one, beginning with the American Medical Association and going down through the various State and district and local societies. It has, I think without exception, the indorsement of every organization and every laboratory and every scientific body. It is really remarkable in that respect because, as Senators know, doctors are notorious for disagreeing with each other, but in this matter apparently the doctors and scientists all agree.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I wish to reply a little further to the query of the Senator from Tennessee in regard to whether there would be any interference with other institutions. I read now from the testimony of Dr. Arthur McCormack, State health officer of Kentucky, who testified rather fully before our committee, indorsing the bill in every way. Here is what he said in part. I asked him this question:

Would this legislation, do you believe, interfere with other institutions?

Doctor McCORMACK. It would help them. The Public Health Service is helping them. I happened to drop in the other day at a conference in the Surgeon General's Office, where various investigators were assembled, who represent organizations that are making a study for the prevention of cancer. At this time they were gathered around one table, just as this committee is considering this matter, and they were there considering the various steps to be taken with a view of correlation and saving the waste of duplication. If in that same way they could be gathered together there and could demonstrate over a period of months, as is contemplated in this bill, the steps that have been taken and should be taken, how valuable it would be to the man just starting in that same field who is going to do constructive work from that point on, and not have to spend the best years of his life in learning what has already been done by the several institutions.

Further on in the hearings the following occurred:

Senator RANSDELL. Thank you very much for that, Doctor. This institute, if established in the big way in which it is conceived, would furnish splendid leadership for all the State boards of health and the medical and other health institutions throughout the country?

Doctor McCORMACK. Exactly. It is just the sort of thing we need to have.

Senator RANSDELL. We look to Washington for nearly all kinds of leadership.

Doctor McCORMACK. Yes. We have an excellent institution here, and such an institution as here proposed will develop the brains and leadership that will lead us in the right direction a great deal further.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. RANSDELL. I am delighted.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator has said it will not multiply the bureaus of the Government but only utilize those now existing.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is true.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was wondering—not that I am opposed to it, but simply for information—how much it would increase the expense to the Federal Government, if at all?

Mr. RANSDELL. It would necessarily enlarge somewhat the Bureau of the Public Health Service. It would be a gradual increase. My opinion is that rich people will contribute more than we are going to need. One of the greatest financiers of America is my authority for saying that. I am not at liberty to give his name. Doctor Johnson, of Yale, and Dr. Reid Hunt, of Harvard, both said at the hearings on this bill that they knew of a number of rich people who would be delighted to have their names connected with such a marvelous altruistic institution as this, dedicated solely to doing good for human beings. There would be, in my judgment, some increase of expenditure on the part of the Government. It would come gradually, however, and it would not hurt us. Let me add that it would not be comparable to the vast sums which we are now expending in fighting the diseases of plants and animals.

Mr. TYDINGS. It is my impression that foreign governments have already more or less adopted the idea; that is, France, Italy, and Germany already contribute to their great academies of research, and so on.

Mr. RANSDELL. I understand they do. But just how much or whether they are giving much more than we are giving I am not prepared to say.

Mr. TYDINGS. Anyone who wanted to contribute to this function of the Government would be entitled to do so?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes; and permitted to do so under the terms of the bill, the money to be devoted solely to the purposes therein specified, and handled by the Public Health Service under the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. RANSDELL. In conclusion, Mr. President, if this bill is passed, and the plans for the national institute of health are carried out in the spirit of their conception, it will soon become the leader of the health forces of mankind. Within its walls will assemble many of the best scientists on earth, in every branch relating to plant and animal life, who will concentrate their hearts and minds on persistent cooperation and organized efforts to ascertain the cause, means of prevention, and cure of every human disease.

Great results are bound to follow from this remarkable combination and concentrated action, with incalculable benefits to our race in relief from sickness, pain, and premature death. When that good day comes, the city of Washington will be the clearing house of health for the entire world, and will dispense in every clime the beneficent discoveries and teachings of its great health institute.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that I hope every Senator will read the address just delivered by the Senator from Louisiana. I am sorry there were not more Senators here to listen to it, for the Senator from Louisiana has made a real contribution to the cause of the public health. I feel that every Senator is indebted to him, and that the whole country is indebted to him, for the study he has made of this subject, and I hope that the Senate, in its wisdom, will see fit, when the appropriate time shall come, to pass his bill, in order that the work which he so well outlined may be made effective.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I wish to join with the Senator from New York in commending the Senator from Louisiana for his very able presentation and very exhaustive study of the important subject upon which he has just spoken. There is nothing that has been done by our State and National Governments in recent years which has contributed so much to the welfare of the human family as have their activities in preventive medicine. The prevention of disease, and of the poverty, misery, and suffering that follow, is a function of government of the highest character.

We have only begun to appreciate its necessity and possibilities. We have only touched this problem of health that is certain to expand and grow. Our activities in behalf of education and commercial expansion are insecure unless we shall do everything possible to preserve the health of our people and to eliminate and eradicate the awful losses and economic consequences of disease.

The Senator from Louisiana has now directed our thoughts into a further field of usefulness into which our Government may enter to help promote the public health. Aside from the merits of his bill, the Senator deserves the commendation of all Senators for having directed their attention to this very wide and useful field of public-service activity, and I wish to join in extending that commendation to him. The protection of the health of our people, the eradication as far as possible of disease by scientific research and sound legislation, is of the highest consideration and the opportunities of governmental assistance to that end are unlimited.

THE AMERICAN FLAG

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Washington Post this morning, misrepresenting and falsifying what transpired here on yesterday, stated that Senator HEFLIN had injected the Catholic issue into the debate. I submit to the Senate that that is not true. I want the RECORD to show that I denounced that report as untrue when I saw it. The issue was injected by the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE]—I think deliberately injected by the Senator—and it must have been the previously agreed-on signal for the assault that was made upon the American flag and its rightful place upon our battleships.

The Washington News contains an article by one Ray Tucker, in which he states:

> The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] called Senator HEFLIN a damned fool, and there was no word of protest against the language as unparliamentary.

I want to ask the Senator from Maryland if he did such a thing?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I am very glad to say in answer to the Senator's question, which I did not know he was going to propound until just now, that I was referring to the right of every American citizen, under our Constitution, to make an exhibition of himself, implying this by the use of certain language. I had no particular reference to any individual, except, so far as in the judgment of others, one might place himself in that category. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Did the Senator intend to say that I was a damned fool?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have just said that I made no direct statement that the Senator from Alabama was impliedly or expressly a damned fool. I observed that under our form of government certain things were possible, and I had no particular individual in mind at the time I uttered those remarks. Does that answer the Senator?

Mr. HEFLIN. No. Then this newspaper saying that the Senator from Maryland called me a damned fool is incorrect, is it not?

Mr. TYDINGS. In so far as the paper says that, I should say it was.

Mr. HEFLIN. I should say so, too, Mr. President. The Senator from Maryland and no other Senator will call me a damned fool to my face. So this paper has deliberately lied about the matter.

Mr. President, that is a part of the slanderous campaign that has been inspired and carried on against me by those who are angry with me because I have been exposing their un-American activities. In their efforts to push forward Roman Catholic demands they have run counter to the interest of American institutions. I have no apology to make to them for my efforts to hold up American ideals and standards. In seeking to have the American flag fly uppermost on its staff I am doing what I think I ought to do as a true American. Why should I crouch and tremble because Roman Catholic influence opposes my efforts? They want the Roman cross to continue to fly above our flag, and I am opposed to it, and so is practically every patriotic body of Jew and Gentile opposed to it.

Mr. President, I was dumfounded on yesterday to see so many supposedly American Senators take the stand they did on this important American question. I am going to make a prediction regarding that printed roll call. It contains trouble back in the States for those who followed the Roman priests. I made one or two predictions here last spring with regard to Mr. Alfred Smith. You have heard of him. I told the Senate then that he would be the worst defeated condidate that ever ran as a Democrat, and he was; I told the Senate he would split the Democratic Party, and he did; and I told the Senate that he would carry less than 12 States, and he did. He did not carry but seven.

I am going to tell you now, Senators, that many of you who voted yesterday on the other side against flying the United States flag above the Roman cross are going to have to face that issue with the people of your States. It is right and proper that you should.

You can not ignore the request of the National Flag Conference, the Flag Code Commission of the United States, the American Legion, and hundreds of other patriotic orders. Let me give you notice, Senators, this fight has just begun. I told the Senate on yesterday that the Italian flag had that cross, and that the only difference between that flag and the Catholic Church pennant is that the Italian flag has the crown besides the Roman cross that flies above the United States flag on our American battleships. Here it is; you can see it for yourself. I told the Senate before you voted yesterday that the Secretary of the Navy was ready to make the change so as to fly the church pennant at another point and not above the Stars and Stripes; the Secretary of our Navy entered no protest against the proposed change; but Senators who are afraid of the Catholic political influence in the United States flew to cover. The slogan of the Knights of Columbus, M. A. C.—Make America Catholic—is the Roman Catholic program. Doctor McDaniel, of Virginia, recently president of the Southern Baptist Convention, said that of all the countries on earth that the Pope wanted to control he wanted most to control the United States.

We saw a sample of it in the last campaign, in the close, compact, and concerted efforts of the Roman Catholics. Why, because people dared to vote against Al Smith, the leading lights of that group accused them of being intolerant; pressure was brought to bear on all Catholics to support him because he was a Catholic.

But they could see no intolerance in their attitude. The Roman Catholic political machine is active, militant, and threatening, and many public men shiver in their shoes in the presence of its intimidating influence; they are afraid of it as of death, and run to cover and sometimes desert our own colors, our own flag, and go on record in the Senate as voting against flying the Stars and Stripes first and on a staff by itself. Senators solemnly went on record voting to permit the continuance of the flying of the Roman cross above the American flag.

I am going to give the whole history of this question one of these days. The Navy suggested to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that it was ready to settle this question. Demands for a change are coming in from all over the country. Patriotic orders over the country are objecting to pulling down our flag and flying anybody's pennant or emblem above it. They want it to fly on a staff all its own. I sought to put such a provision in the law, in response to my own desire and the demand coming from patriotic people all over the country.

The Navy itself expressed a willingness to have this thing done, and the Senator from Maine told the Senate that he had taken my amendment up with the Navy and the Navy had no objection to it: that it was willing to comply with the requirements of the amendment, and as chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate he said, "I, therefore, accept the amendment." After he said he would accept it, this Roman influence commenced to get busy about this Capitol, and Rome triumphed. The amendment was defeated. Although the Flag Code Commission of the United States was unanimously for that provision, although the American Legion was for it—the boys who bore that flag to victory upon the battle front in France—and although patriotic men and women everywhere wanted the question settled that no flag or pennant should fly above the Stars and Stripes, the Senate voted to keep the situation as it is, despite the willingness of the Secretary of the Navy to make the change, and despite the fact that patriotic bodies all over the country were demanding that the change be made.

Let Senators explain to their constituents why on a roll call they voted to continue flying the Roman cross above the Stars and Stripes, rather than fly it and other church pennants at another place, leaving the flag of the United States to fly on its own staff without pulling it down 1 or 2 feet for anybody's pennant or emblem. Mr. President, I never expected to see a majority of the Senate of the United States deliberately vote to have the American flag pulled down in order that the Roman cross might continue to fly above it on our battleships.

What influence is it that is fighting my flag amendment but that Roman influence? None. There is not a Protestant order in the United States; there is not a Jewish order in the United States that opposes it. Protestants and Jews are for this amendment; the American people are for it; patriotic bodies everywhere are for it; the American Legion is for it; the Navy is for it; the chairman of the Naval Committee is for it; but strange to say, the Senate would not vote to let it go into the cruiser bill and become a law.

Mr. President, I expect soon to submit some documents on this subject. I am going to hear from a great many people about this matter. The American people will disapprove your vote on yesterday. The battle that started here yesterday is but the beginning of this fight to protect and exalt the American flag. Your action yesterday does not chill my ardor in the least. I have fought battles here before when there were very few on my side to start with. I fought one battle in the Senate when I was by myself at the beginning, but when I finished there were 57 Senators on my side. That was when I drove from the Federal Reserve Board W. P. G. Harding, who had betrayed the country and the President who appointed him and helped to bring on the worst panic that ever cursed the country.

I have been in other battles, Mr. President. Temporary setbacks and delays have no terrors for me. When I know I am right, when I know I am serving my country, I do not care who opposes me. You Senators who voted against the American program for the Roman program on yesterday will have to face the issue before your constituents at home. They are going to know about it. And I imagine they will ask you this:

"Were you present when Senator HEFLIN'S flag amendment was proposed to the cruiser bill?"

"Yes."

"I understand that it provided for flying the American flag on a staff by itself, so that it could be first and supreme in its position as the flag of our country?"

"Yes."

"And doing away with the custom of pulling that flag down in order to put some pennant or emblem above it on the same staff?"

"Yes."

"He sought to leave our flag flying in its own right and on its own staff or hoist proudly alone?"

"Yes."

"He did not want to do away with the use of church pennants. He was willing for you to have your different church pennants hoisted at another place, at a high point on the battleship?"

"Yes."

"He was willing for you to have the church pennant put up on its own pole or staff when religious services were being held on the ship?"

"Yes: that is right."

"And the Navy Department said they were willing for that to be done, and they would provide the necessary equipment to carry out the provisions of the amendment, in order to prevent the lowering of the United States flag every time a pennant was to be flown?"

"Yes."

"Since so many patriotic Americans favored the change and nobody opposed it but certain Roman Catholics; why did you vote against it?"

Well, some of you will say, perhaps, that Senator BRUCE, of Maryland, got up and said that the pennant was the Catholic pennant, and it was the only one that was flown above the Stars and Stripes; and that then the seasoned warrior and veteran legislator, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], suddenly became excited and exclaimed: "Well, the amendment is not so bad, but the turn the debate has taken is terrible." I told the Senator from Idaho that I did not inject the Catholic issue. That it was the Senator from Maryland that did it; and he knew it. Now, seriously, did not the Senator from Idaho have a poor, little flimsy excuse for becoming excited when the Senator from Maryland told him that I was trying to prevent the flying of the Roman flag above the American flag? Your people will ask you:

"What influence was it that opposed the Heflin flag amendment?"

"Roman Catholic."

"Did anybody else object to it?"

"No."

"Did anybody else outside seek to prevent the passage of the bill except Roman Catholics?"

"No."

And then they will say to you that they think that it is high time that we put only real Americans on guard in the Senate.

And they are going to do it. I see several Senators around me that are not coming back here because of the stand you decided to take on yesterday when this question was squarely put up to you.

I have told the Senator from Maryland that. I told him when he took that same stand 18 months ago that he was dead politically, and all he needed to do was to fold his hands across his breast and lay a lily on his chest. [Laughter.]

The Senator on yesterday attributes his defeat to intolerance and bigotry. Why, Mr. President, the Senator beat himself. He hopped out and championed the Catholic program in the Senate and outside of it, and he has made the people of Maryland and everywhere else sick and tired of his effusions on the subject. He has jumped on the Ku-Klux Klan, a Protestant order—and the Ku-Klux Klan has a right to exist. I have read its principles, and they are noble principles; and I submit that they certainly helped to do a good job in the last campaign. When they helped to turn out the Raskobs, with the Roman Tammany bunch, they were rendering lofty service to their country and performing a great patriotic duty.

The Senator from Maryland has harped on liquor and wet propaganda until he has lost the prohibition vote of his State.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRUCE. Has the Senator's attention been called to the fact that only day before yesterday the General Assembly of Maryland, by a decisive vote, defeated the State prohibition-enforcement measure?

Mr. HEFLIN. Now who would have thought that the Senator would take advantage of me to get in that statement that I objected to this morning. I was going to withdraw my objection to it later, Mr. President. At the time, though, I had gotten sick and tired of these matters that the Senator would inject in here about wets and antiprohibition. I heard a Senator remark the other day that if the Senator from Maryland was sitting anywhere in the hall, it did not make any difference what he was doing, and any Senator anywhere else in the hall rose to speak, and said anything about prohibition, the Senator from Maryland was on his feet in an instant; and that is true. He always has something to say on that subject. I say, in all good nature, that all that helped to defeat the Senator.

Now again, Mr. President, I ask why should not this country do what it wants to do with its flag? I do not care what religious denomination it is; we are not going to reach the point, and get away with it, where we can not discuss any group's activities in politics and in our civic affairs. I submit that our right to protect and safeguard that flag does not concern the Catholic's right to worship God as he chooses, and I would not deny him his right to worship as he chooses. I do not care what his form of worship is. I am against the persistent political activities of the Catholic Church, the political organization of the church, and the fruits of that political activity; and I am getting weary of these weak-kneed Protestants who stand up when they are prodded a little by that influence and condemn other people for being intolerant and bigoted because they stand for American ideals and American institutions.

Senators, I can give you some experiences that I had with the intolerance of certain Roman Catholics that I did not know about until I discussed this Mexican war question. When I went out to speak in the States upon the invitation of patriotic men and women, everywhere I went I found a Catholic priest or priests and Knights of Columbus trying to prevent the local people from obtaining a hall for me to speak in, to discuss the Catholic program to plunge us into war with Mexico. Frequently they were told, "Why, a Knight of Columbus spoke in that hall a few nights ago; he discussed the Mexican question, and we want Senator HEFLIN to speak. We want to hear the other side. The papers have misrepresented what he said in the Senate, and we want to hear him. This is our country. He is a United States Senator. We want to hear what he has to say. Why are you going around here telling us that we ought not to have that hall and trying to prevent us from having a hall? You are interfering with the right of peaceful assembly and the right of free speech."

I had that experience myself. I do not believe there is a single place to which I went, out of 25 or 30 in the various States, where I was not told by the local committee that the Knights of Columbus and the priests had been around trying to get the school board to prevent me from having a hall in which to discuss the Mexican question. One place to which I went was Butler, Pa., and the committee there told me that the school board wanted to see me. I said, "All right; I shall be delighted to see them." They came up to the hotel, and one of them, the spokesman, said:

"The priest objects to your having the school auditorium."

I said, "Is it a Protestant institution?"

"Yes."

"Built by the Protestants?"

"Yes."

"And a Catholic priest is going to object to you Protestants having a Protestant speak in a Protestant school hall?"

"Well, he objects."

I said, "I am not surprised at that. They have done that everywhere else."

"Well, this priest says if you will agree not to say anything about the Catholics, either here or in Mexico, or the Catholic Church, he will consent to your having the hall."

I said, "Has a Catholic priest got to consent for me to have the hall? I never have asked one of them to consent for me to speak or to have a hall in which to speak, and I refuse to do it now."

One of them said, "Oh, we are not requiring that. We are just telling you what he said."

"Well, you tell him that I said that I will discuss this question, and I will give the facts; and if he wants to challenge any statement I make, let him do it in the public hall. I am not going to agree to anything with him. It is none of his business. This is a free country, and I resent this interference, this bold arrogance on the part of this priest, sending somebody to me to tell me that I can speak if I will consent to say or not to say certain things."

They went back and told him. He was very mad, they said; and one of the committee told me that night that he walked out of the bank where they were talking, very mad, and he said, "Well, if you are going to let him speak, I tell you now you are going to have trouble at the hall. The Knights of Columbus will not stand for it, and I can not control them."

What do you think of that? Is not that glorious tolerance? Is not that good enough to roll under your tongue as a sweet morsel? He said, "I can not control the Knights of Columbus. You will have trouble."

I spoke that night, and I told that audience what the message was, that he said that he could not control them; and I said, "I believe that you are red-blooded Americans, and I do not think you are going to submit to any interference. If the Knights start anything here, and the priest can not control them, we will control them"; and there was no disturbance there that night.

Mr. President, I am opposed to intolerance; but I am not guilty of intolerance when I want the American flag to fly upon a staff by itself, above the Roman cross and everybody else's banner or pennant.

This is a serious issue that you Senators have on your backs. The record is there. It is written. And I think it is like the Newberry record. There are going to be more casualties in it than you have any idea of when the people back home read that debate, and read what the Senator from Maryland said when he asked me if it was not a fact that the only cross or emblem that flies above the United States flag is the Catholic flag. That is in there; and the vote finally came, and there were 10 that stood unshaken by the appeal of the priests. They are like those that stand out as beacon lights in the history of the past, who had the American viewpoint and who dared to bare their breasts to the opposition and take a stand for the flag of their country.

I am not taking or seeking to take from the Catholics anything that belongs to them. I wish them well in all proper American endeavor. Let them worship as they choose, and serve God as they choose; but do not let them try to make America Catholic. And they are not going to tell us where the American flag shall fly. I repeat, we have just begun to fight.

I am going to introduce a bill on the subject to-morrow. We are going to have a hearing here at the Capitol before a Senate committee. We are going to give red-blooded Americans in the States a chance to write or come in here and tell us how they feel on this subject; and I am going to continue to press it. I am going to continue to fight for the honor and prestige due the American flag. We are not going to stop until that flag flies by itself, majestic and supreme, first and uppermost on every American battleship and cruiser and other naval vessels.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say at this time on that particular phase of the subject.

Just a few words before I finish about the Catholic cry of "intolerance." The people are getting very tired of the overworking of that word. They are weary of having it buried by certain Catholics and their Protestant agents at Protestants only. They agree that there is some of it on both sides and not all of it on one side. We saw a sample of it in the last presidential campaign. It was stated in the Catholic press with great emphasis that Smith would be elected if he were not a Roman Catholic, and I tell you that if he had not been a Roman Catholic he would never have been Governor of New York. If he had been a Protestant he would never have been Governor of New York State. You all know the influence that put him in the governor's chair and the influence that nominated him for President. It was the Roman Catholic influence. And since his defeat reports are coming in from various Roman Catholic papers. I have read a number of them myself, and I have them now, giving the reasons for his defeat, attributing it to the ignorant, prejudiced, intolerant, bigoted Methodists, Baptists, and Presbyterians and other Protestant Americans. Again I say, is not that sweet tolerance? It is the bitterest kind and meanest kind of intolerance.

The question is here, Mr. President, and we have got to deal with it. It was in the last campaign, and if the Democratic Party nominates Smith again Hoover's majority was not a circumstance to what the next one will be. Smith polled in the neighborhood of 15,000,000 votes. He got about 7,000,000 Catholic votes, and the others—Democrats, wet Republicans, and some progressives, and what not—ran it up to 15,000,000 votes.

Now, I want to make a prediction about what will happen if they nominate him again. But they are not going to do it. The party betrayed at Houston and humiliatingly defeated, is going to rise again and have a new leader, and he is not coming out of New York, either. He is not going to be Alfred Smith, and he is not going to be his man Friday, Franklin Roosevelt. He is coming from another section. There is going to be a new day and a new deal in the Democratic Party in which all real Democrats can get together. We are going to shake off the grave clothes of Tammany and write a declaration of independence from the corrupt Tammany forces that hung like a millstone about the neck of the party in the last campaign.

Mr. President, if Smith should happen to be nominated again by another betrayal of the Democratic Party, his vote will dwindle down to the Catholic vote only. He will poll in the neighborhood of 7,000,000 votes. Mark that, and remember it. He got 7,000,000 votes in the last election that will not go to him again. I have heard men here and in the other branch and outside who supported him say that they supported him before purely for regularity's sake but would not support him again. I have heard men say that they thought a certain religious group would try to run him again in 1932, and that if they did seek to nominate him the split would come this time at the convention; and it will. I want to give them warning now that they are not going to tie this body of political death about the neck of the Democratic Party permanently. We are going to shake it off and be done with it, and America is going to be run by Americans, and her American Protestant institutions are going to be preserved at any cost, and if certain Senators will not vote for them here, as some of them indicated yesterday they would not, there will be others here to take their places who will stand up and be counted on the right side when the rights of the American flag are involved, and who will not be afraid and run to cover when they hear the rustle of priestly robes in the corridors of this Capitol.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BINGHAMTON, N. Y.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I introduce a bill for the relief of the city of Binghamton, in the State of New York, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Fifteen years ago Congress directed the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire a site in the city of Binghamton for the use and accommodation of the post office, courts, and other Federal offices in that city. The site was purchased. Congress was persuaded to vote the authorization and to appropriate the necessary money—$100,000—by the facts set forth in the House report recommending the bill for passage. From that report I quote the following:

> The present building is antiquated, crowded to its very doors, and is absolutely inadequate for the needs of the service in the city of Binghamton. In addition, it was partially destroyed by fire during 1913, making a bad situation worse.

That was 15 years ago. That condition has continued. The site has been acquired but no building has ever been erected upon it. The city of Binghamton has been denied the taxes that would ordinarily be assessable against the property but it has not derived any benefits in the way of service for its citizens. The city of Binghamton has expended money for the beautification of the approaches to the site purchased by the Government, but the Government has permitted the site to go unused for Federal purposes.

The result is that the people of Binghamton are not only denied the benefits of adequate Federal facilities but are denied the taxes that would be assessable against two Federal sites, both the old and the new.

The site which has been purchased by the Government has been leased out to its former owner who is enjoying the benefit of tax-free property. The Government has been deriving revenue from this property and has been enjoying the protection and services provided by the city of Binghamton but has given nothing in return.

I am fully cognizant of the fact that in the ordinary case where there is a normal lapse of time between the acquisition of the site and the construction of the building, Congress has refused to require the Secretary of the Treasury to pay local taxes and assessments. This, however, is not a normal case. A positive injustice has been and is being done to the people of Binghamton, and the least that the Congress can do is to provide that so long as the Federal Government continues to own that site in Binghamton and refuses to erect a building thereon, so long shall the Federal Government be liable for such taxes as would be assessable against the property were it in private ownership.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Claims the resolutions adopted by the Common Council of Binghamton.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 5708) for the relief of the city of Binghamton, N. Y., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The resolutions presented by Mr. WAGNER were referred to the Committee on Claims, to accompany the bill, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN COMMON COUNCIL,
Binghamton, N. Y., December 27, 1928.

Resolution seeking reimbursement to the city from the Federal Government for local improvement (by Alderman Delaney)

Whereas the United States of America, since December, 1915, has been, and now is, the owner of a large tract of land situate at the junction of State, Henry, and Washington Streets in this city, which is valuable property in the central and business section of said city; and

Whereas the said lands were purchased by the Federal Government for the avowed purpose of erecting a new post office and Federal building thereon; and

Whereas such purpose has not been carried out; instead the buildings on said premises, which were reserved to the grantor in the conveyance of said lands to the Federal Government, and which were to be razed whenever the Federal authorities should so require, have been allowed to remain standing on said premises; meanwhile said lands have been continuously leased by the Federal Government to its said grantor and to said grantor's successors in interest as the owner of said buildings, under which lease said Federal Government has received $500 per year as ground rent; and said buildings have in turn been sublet by the successive owners thereof for numerous and varied business purposes, with the result that a large net revenue has been derived annually therefrom by said successive lessees of said Federal Government's lands; and

Whereas the occupancy of said buildings in the manner aforesaid has imposed divers burdens upon the city of Binghamton for street improvements, for street lighting, for police and fire protection, and the like; and

Whereas the following local improvements adjacent to said premises have been made for which, under private ownership, the following assessments could have been made against and would have been a lien upon said premises, viz:

In 1927: Washington Street pavement, proportion of assessment	$913.29
In 1928: Henry Street pavement, proportion of assessment	800.45
In 1928: State Street pavement, proportion of assessment	927.93
Total	2,641.67

And

Whereas there are other assessments for ornamental lighting, and perhaps for other improvements, the data concerning which has not yet been collated; and

Whereas by virtue of its sovereignty the United States Government is exempt from the burdens imposed upon the citizens of this municipality for State, county, and city taxes; claims a like exemption from any and all assessments for local improvements; and has paid no taxes whatsoever upon said premises since its ownership thereof; and

Whereas the spirit and purpose of exempting Federal property from local taxation is because such property is presumably being used for the public benefit, which has never been done with the property in question; but instead has been devoted to private uses, from which the Federal Government has derived upward of $6,000 in rentals, which have to some extent been in competition with tax-burdened properties in that vicinity; so that in equity and fairness the Federal Government should at least reimburse the city of Binghamton for its proportionate share of the aforesaid local improvements: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congressman from this district and the United States Senators from the State of New York be, and severally are, urged with all possible emphasis to bring this injustice to the city of Binghamton and to its taxpayers to the attention of the Congress of the United States, and to such other departments and officials of the Federal Government as they shall deem proper, and to put forth all honorable efforts to secure reimbursement to said city for such local improvements, either by congressional appropriation or otherwise, as they may be advised; and be it further

Resolved, That the mayor and other appropriate city officials are hereby authorized and requested to collect all data regarding such local improvements of every name and nature, and to submit the same to said Congressman and United States Senators and to cooperate in all appropriate ways in securing suitable relief from the injustice of the existing situation of affairs; and be it further

Resolved, That the city clerk shall cause certified copies of this resolution to be transmitted to Congressman CLARKE, United States Senators COPELAND and WAGNER, and to Postmaster Henry B. Mulford as the custodian of the Federal property in this city.

STATE OF NEW YORK,
County of Broome, city of Binghamton, ss:

I, Archie B. Jones, clerk of said city, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a copy of a resolution which was unanimously adopted by the common council of the city of Binghamton at a meeting held on the 27th day of December, 1928; and that I have compared the same with the original now on file in my office and that the same is a correct and true copy of said original and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the said city of Binghamton this 31st day of December, 1928.

[SEAL.] ARCHIE B. JONES, City Clerk.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 15092) to authorize an appropriation to pay half the cost of a bridge near the Soboba Indian Reservation, Calif., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STECK in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I understand that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DENEEN] prefers that the Scott Field matter be taken up after we have disposed of the Sacramento provision.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I think that at least the members of the Committee on Military Affairs who helped draft this bill ought to be in the Senate. Therefore I make the point of no quorum.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 81, line 14, the committee proposes to strike out "$1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$400,000," so as to read:

Flood control, Sacramento River, Calif.: For prosecuting work of flood control in accordance with the provisions of the flood control act approved March 1, 1917 (U. S. C. 1090, sec. 703), as modified by the flood control act approved May 15, 1928 (45 Stat. 534), $400,000.

And on page 81 to strike out lines 15 to 22, inclusive, in the following words:

Return of funds contributed for flood control, Sacramento River, Calif.: For return to the State of California of funds contributed by the State for flood control in the Sacramento River, under the provisions of section 2 of the flood control act approved March 1, 1917 (U. S. C. 1090, sec. 703), as authorized by section 13 of the flood control act approved May 15, 1928 (45 Stat. 534), $4,370,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the consideration of this item, but the bill was taken up for consideration on Saturday evening during my absence, and there were some other items which probably have been adopted by the Senate and about which I wanted to inquire. I shall not delay action on this item now, however.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there are two amendments made in the bill as submitted by the committee to the Senate, both of which I think may be presented together, and both of these amendments I ask the Senate to reject.

The first of the reasons I advance for the position I assume is that the items as reported to the House and as passed by the House constitute to-day the law of the land, and, constituting the law, they should not be eliminated by the Senate committee from the bill as it passed the House. These two items are found on page 81, lines 9 to 22.

In line 14 the numerals "$1,000,000" were stricken out by the Senate committee and "$400,000" inserted.

The second of the amendments was to strike out lines 15 to 22, inclusive, as follows:

Return of funds contributed for flood control, Sacramento River, Calif.: For return to the State of California of funds contributed by the State for flood control in the Sacramento River, under the provisions of section 2 of the flood control act approved March 1, 1917 (U. S. C. 1090, sec. 703), as authorized by section 13 of the flood control act approved May 15, 1928 (45 Stat. 534), $4,370,000.

Both of these items received the unanimous approval of the House committee. Both of them unanimously passed the House. Without hearing by the Senate committee, and indeed, though I do not say this in criticism of the committee at all, but without consideration, in reality, without notice to any of the parties interested both were amended in the particulars I have indicated.

Mr. President, this particular territory is in the congressional district of Mr. CHARLES F. CURRY, Representative of the State of California in the Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to ask the Senator if the amendment which he is discussing is now before the Senate for consideration?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understood that the bill was to be read first for the consideration of amendments and that we were to take up the committee amendments as they were reached.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from North Carolina that the bill has been read for amendments, committee amendments were considered, and this is one of the four committee amendments which were passed over.

Mr. OVERMAN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is one of the four amendments which were passed over, and are now called up, as I understand it, by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and therefore I am speaking to this particular amendment.

The Sacramento River is in the district of Mr. CHARLES F. CURRY, a Representative of the State of California in the Congress. The river has been particularly a matter of interest to Mr. CURRY. Not only has it been a matter of interest to him, but Senators upon the other side of the Chamber, who have been interested in the Mississippi River, and who have devoted themselves with such vigilance and such industry and such pertinacity and such ability to the Mississippi River problems, will understand and sympathize with Mr. CURRY when I say that the endeavor he has made in respect to the Sacramento River is comparable to their efforts in behalf of the Mississippi. He has devoted practically a lifetime to that work and has very well, indeed, accomplished the purposes of the United States Government and of the State and the landowners, too.

Mr. CURRY is unfortunately very ill at the present time, but I, too, am familiar with the particular locality. I lived 35 years under the pall of the threat of flood in that particular territory. I lived during that period, sir, where I was born, upon the Sacramento River, and I understand something respecting it. Let me say to you, sir, that the river, of itself, is one of the major streams of the United States. It has a commerce that is only second to that of the Monongahela and fourth in river-borne commerce in the United States. The river commerce serves a purpose far beyond the mere transportation of goods, for it is a great stabilizing factor, in the State of California, of railroad transportation and of freight rates.

The river has been peculiar, because it was a river originally of tremendous depth and tremendous possibilities commercially, which, by virtue of hydraulic mining, with which there may not be very many here familiar, finally became an object of solicitude to the United States Government. Hydraulic mining, if none of the Senators are familiar with what we become familiar with in the State of California in the years gone by, was an industry that literally put hundreds of millions of gold into circulation in this Nation, but in doing that it almost destroyed this great commercial waterway. Great pumps and enormous streams of water that were used by hydraulic mining washed away whole mountains that ran down then into the Sacramento River and caused that river to rise and rise and rise until all the settlers along the banks of the river were in constant dread and in constant peril of floods.

Senators can readily imagine that that kind of process led to warfare between the miners in the mountains and the farmers in the valleys, a warfare indeed which, during my youth, was exceedingly bitter, a warfare which led ultimately to various decisions in the different courts of the land. Ultimately the United States courts rendered a decision by which under injunction hydraulic mining was restrained because of the loss that it presented to the farming land far down in the valleys. Then the United States Government took charge of the river and took charge of its improvement and its navigation through what was termed the Débris Commission. The California Débris Commission, since those days away back in the eighties, has been appointed by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate, and the Government of the United States under the Caminetti Act, with the California Débris Commission, has permitted, under license, a sort of hydraulic mining and has endeavored to do its duty in respect to this great waterway in that territory.

There are to-day, sir, just two national flood-control projects, one relating to the Mississippi River and the other to the Sacramento River. Up to the time of the passage of the Mississippi flood control act in 1928 those who were contiguous to the Sacramento River, in the endeavor to control its navigation and its flood, and in the endeavor to do what was essential in order to maintain it as a great commercial highway, paid a proportion of the expense far exceeding that which, under any other project under national control, had been paid by any people in this great Nation of ours. The Government paid one-sixth of the expense, the State——

Mr. WARREN. One-sixth?

Mr. JOHNSON. One-sixth in the later years. The State paid one-sixth, and the landowners paid the remainder that was necessary.

The burden became extraordinarily heavy upon the landowners, for the greater burden fell upon them, and they have expended some $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 and odd in an endeavor to control the river and make it navigable in accordance with the desires of the engineers of the United States Government. Finally it was assumed that this proportionate expense was unjust and unfair, and then was agitated in the Congress the changing of the proportionate expense to make it one-third upon the Government, one-third upon the State, and one-third upon the residents. Finally in 1928, when the Mississippi flood control bill was passed by the Congress of the United States the design of making it one-third, and one-third, and one-third was enacted into law under the provisions of that act.

I read, in order that Members of the Senate who are not familiar with the proposition may understand, section 13 of the Mississippi River flood control act approved May 15, 1928, which provides:

> That the project for the control of floods in the Sacramento River, Calif., adopted by section 2 of the act approved March 1, 1917, entitled "An act providing for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes," is hereby modified in accordance with the report of the California Débris Commission—

This, I wish Senators to keep in mind, is a national commission called the California Débris Commission—> submitted in Senate Document No. 23, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, provided that the total amount contributed by the Federal Government, including the amounts heretofore contributed by it, shall in no event exceed in the aggregate $17,600,000.

The original proportion which was to be assumed by the Government in this flood-control project, this governmental flood-control project, was $6,000,000 or thereabouts. I may not be accurate in the hundreds of thousands, but it was——

Mr. JONES. It was $5,600,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thank the Senator. That was the original amount, but the original estimate of money required to carry out what the United States engineers had directed to be done was $31,000,000 in round numbers. But the cost of labor and material, subject to the war, led the engineers of the United States Government to revise the original estimate of $31,000,000, and then their estimate of the cost of the project was made in round numbers $51,000,000. It was then that the United States Government obligated itself to pay $17,000,000, which was one-third of the total amount estimated to be the cost of the project.

In section 13, as I have indicated, we approved and made a part of the law the report of the California Débris Commission, submitted in Senate Document No. 23, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session. That is the law to-day. To-day there is no question about what the law is in this regard. If the law requires an appropriation of $1,000,000 per year and a refund of the amount that is stated in this bill, why should the Senate and how can the Senate thus endeavor to repeal the law or prevent its operation by an amendment of this sort? It was provided in the recommendations of the Débris Commission, to which I have adverted, that—

> The limit set on the contribution of the United States by the act of March 1, 1917, be increased from $5,600,000 to $17,700,000, including what has already been appropriated.

Follow this, Senators, because this is what we enacted into law last year:

> That the annual appropriation be increased from $500,000 to $1,000,000, the limit set by existing law, so as to permit the completion of the work within a reasonable time.

An appropriation of $400,000, as proposed in the bill now before us, will not permit the completion of the work within a reasonable time. We adopted the report requiring the appropriation of $1,000,000 each year in accordance with the engineer's recommendation to which I have just adverted.

In addition to that, I have before me the budget of the State of California showing the appropriation by the State of its $1,000,000 per year. Upon what theory does the United States Government enter into a pact of this sort with its people and with a State by which it shall appropriate $1,000,000 a year, and then, when the State has acted upon it and the people themselves are acting under it, come here and change the amount from $1,000,000 to $400,000?

I read now another section of the report which was adopted by the law that was enacted in 1928 and is the law of the land to-day:

> That the United States return to the State of California the amount which shall have been expended on the project by the California Débris Commission from funds contributed by the State at the time of the adoption of these recommendations.

The refund, sir, may seem at first blush to be a refund from the Treasury of the United States. But, sir, under the law it applies upon the $17,000,000 which the Government is to pay, so that it does not increase by a single, solitary penny the amount which the Government is obligated to pay upon this project. It simply borrows, as it were, from Peter to pay Paul in order that more appropriately and more readily landowners may be relieved of the liens that were upon their lands and complete the work at the earliest possible moment. That is what the refund constitutes. That is all the item constitutes.

The House of Representatives adopted this provision unanimously. The House committee had no disagreement of any kind or of any character upon it. The Senate committee, I think without full knowledge of the situation, recommended the amendment that has been put into the bill. Now permit me to read a letter that was sent to me—and it was sent to me, I presume, out of the kindness of the gentleman's heart; I do not know him, but he happens to be a friend of Representative CURRY, of California.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I have just come into the Chamber and have not heard all the Senator from California has had to say on this subject. I therefore ask for what purpose was the original indebtedness incurred that involves the United States Government in this transaction?

Mr. JOHNSON. For flood control and navigation on the Sacramento River. If the Senator from Virginia has any question in his mind about the navigation of the Sacramento River, I have some figures here that will enable him to see the importance of that stream. It is a stream that enters into what we term Carquinez Straits, a body of water which in reality is a part of the Bay of San Francisco. The commerce of the Sacramento River comes from the entire region extending some hundreds of miles to the north, comes down the river to the Bay of San Francisco, and up from the bay to the various points upon the river. That commerce aggregates about $100,000,000 a year, and it has increased constantly under the fostering care of the United States Government through its Board of Engineers, termed the California Débris Commission, and the help that the Government has given and that the State and the landowners have given.

For instance, let me call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the year 1900 tonnage had increased to 465,725 tons; in 1918 it had increased to 1,053,510 tons, with a valuation of $113,999,000, representing the astounding figure of an average of $108 per ton, that figure, of course, being calculated on the basis of war-time prices. At that time the United States engineers stated that this valuation was more than four times as great per ton as the value of the commerce on the next great commerce-carrying river in the United States. In 1926 there were moved 1,223,000 tons, valued at $85,000,000, or an average of over $70 per ton. The break in the value of the commerce came after the war and during the time of agricultural depression.

General Taylor, in speaking of the river and its possibilities, said:

> It is very large. It is one of the most intensively navigated streams in the country. I think, except for the Monongahela, there is probably no other stream in the country—except, possibly, the Hudson River up to Albany—practically no other river in the country carries as much as the Sacramento. It is a kind of navigation which is very useful. It is a delta country and is cut up a good deal by sloughs, which carry depths of from 7 to 10, 12, and 15 feet. These sloughs are navigable by small boats, gasoline-operated boats, or sailboats, which go to the various farms and pick up produce. You will see on that river fleets of these small boats carrying hay and grain and farm produce of all kinds.

I could read much more from the statistics should it be desired.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, exactly what I want to know is when the Federal Government incurred any obligation to pay this money which it is now proposed that the Congress shall appropriate and which the Senator stated, as I heard him as I came into the Chamber, is a mere payment on an obligation of the Government?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I will not go back to 1917 and the flood control act of that year, but prior to that time the original provision of the law provided that the Government should pay a one-sixth and the State and the settlers should pay the remainder. Subsequently there was agitation, as I explained before the Senator from Virginia came into the Chamber, to bring about a more equitable division. The burden became unduly onerous upon the landowners. Then it was proposed that the proportion be one-third by the United States Government, one-third by the State government, and one-third by the landowners. In 1928 we passed the Mississippi flood control bill, section 13 of which related to the Sacramento River project. Only two governmental flood-control projects are there in the United States in reality—the Mississippi flood control and the Sacramento River flood control. In the law which we passed in 1928 we affirmed and adopted the report of the California Débris Commission, which consisted of United States Engineers appointed by the President and approved by the Senate, who have charge of navigation and flood control and rectification, and the like, on the Sacramento River. That report, thus approved, became a part of the law. The hearings before the House committee were plenary upon the subject.

The report of the California Débris Commission provides, as I read a few moments ago, for the proportion one-third, one-third, and one-third. It provides as well for a $1,000,000 appropriation a year in conjunction with a like expenditure by the State and the landowners; it provides as well, for use upon the project, of a refund of the amount of money that had been paid theretofore by the landowners and the State in excess of the proportion of the one-third that had just been fixed by the law. The items that are in the bill are the items under the law. So it is not necessary in reality to discuss the navigability of the Sacramento River, its useful purposes, and the like, because the law already has fixed these items. They were fixed in the flood control act of 1928; no one can gainsay that. So, whether we like the law or do not like the law, there it is, fixing these things to be done, and they were fixed after long hearings before the House committee that finally adopted the plan.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, did the original act provide that there should be a refund to the State of California over any period of years heretofore for the improvement of the river?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; I will read it again to the Senator; I do not think he was in the Chamber when I read it before:

> That the United States return to the State of California the amount which shall have been expended on the project by the California Débris Commission from funds contributed by the State at the time of the adoption of these recommendations.

Mr. GLASS. That is what I want to know. The Senator will understand that I am interested in the matter as a member of the Appropriations Committee, and I merely want to know what we are appropriating for.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am very delighted to answer any question that shall be put to me. My opinion is that if I could have had five minutes before the Appropriations Committee to explain this matter there would have been no difficulty about it, but I did not know the committee was going to act upon it. Knowing, first, that the House had acted and passed it unanimously; secondly, that the United States Engineers had recommended it; thirdly, that the Budget had sent down a recommendation in favor of it, and the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee not being hostile or adverse, I did not for an instant imagine that there was going to be any difficulty with the full committee. That difficulty, I think, arose simply from the fact that there was no statement of the facts before the committee at that time.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I should like to say a word, if I may.

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator from Virginia should understand that the phrase read by the Senator from California was not in the law itself, but was in the report of the California Débris Commission which is referred to in the law. In 1928 an amendment was put on the Mississippi flood control bill, known as section 13, and that amendment was carried through in the bill and is in the law now. That amendment provided that the Sacramento project, as provided for in 1917, should be modified in accordance with the engineers' report, and it is from that report that the Senator from California was just reading.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is correct. If the Senator from Virginia should like to hear the section read, it is very brief and I will read it.

> SEC. 13. That the project for the control of floods in the Sacramento River, Calif., adopted by section 2 of the act approved March 1, 1917, entitled "An act to provide for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes," is hereby modified in accordance with the report of the California Débris Commission, submitted in Senate Document No. 23, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session: Provided, That the total amounts contributed by the Federal Government, including the amounts heretofore contributed by it, shall in no event exceed in the aggregate $17,600,000.

I was about to refer to a letter that was sent me by a gentleman who——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Not as affecting the question now being discussed, but as information I should like to have, will the Senator tell us when the original provision was made—as I recall, it was made years ago—concerning the Débris Commission and the payment of a portion of the sum by the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think that the Débris Commission came into existence under the Caminetti Act. In the later eighties or early nineties that act was passed, as I remember. The Senator probably was here and will recall it.

Mr. WARREN. I recall that many years ago there were small amounts of money annually paid, but I lost sight of the proportions.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Caminetti Act was passed by the Congress for the purpose, if possible, of composing the differences between the farmers of the valley and the miners of the hills. Senators can have no comprehension of how bitter that contest became. I was a resident of the city of Sacramento at the time, and the bitterness was something that passes belief. There were the great hills being washed down and filling up the river. I think at Sacramento the bed of the river was filled for 10 or 12 feet, and at Marysville for 15 or 20 feet. One of the strange sights of my boyhood was to stand upon the levee at Marysville and see flow by me the river and away down below the town a city of now 10,000 inhabitants and growing all the time. Just so it was with all the cities on the Sacramento River. To compose those differences, Congress took a hand after the United States court had rendered their celebrated Bloomfield decision enjoining hydraulic mining. The Congress sought to permit hydraulic mining with the least possible danger and injury to the farming lands below. Then came into being the California Débris Commission of United States engineers, appointed by the Government, and from that time they have been in charge of the work.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Was the hydraulic mining done by the Government or by private owners seeking gold?

Mr. JOHNSON. It was all done by private owners.

Mr. OVERMAN. How, then, is the Government responsible for the damage which ensued?

Mr. JOHNSON. The mining took place on the public domain and the Government, perhaps, may have been originally responsible; but, at any rate, the Government derived a tremendous profit from the enormous amount of gold that then was being produced in California and it desired to protect the farmers below and to maintain as well this great waterway.

I will read to the Senate a letter that came to me from Representative DRIVER, of Arkansas. He puts rather tersely the whole proposition, and perhaps the Senate may better grasp it from his letter than from the rambling remarks which I have made:

> At the request of my colleague, CHARLES F. CURRY, of California, I am presenting to you as a member of the Committee on Flood Control of the House of Representatives the conditions which justified the modification of the original act of March 1, 1917, providing for the control of the floods on the Sacramento River in California and the amendatory acts with relation thereto. The modification carried in the act of May 15, 1928, was in the nature of increasing the proportionate cost for the completion of the project theretofore borne by the Federal Government and the State of California, with a proportionate diminution of the contributions required of the local landowners. Under the provisions of the original act, the division of cost was made on the basis of two-thirds, by the local interests, and one-sixth each by the State of California and the Federal Government. The original estimated cost of the project was placed at $33,000,000, of which the Federal Government and the State of California would contribute $5,500,000 each, leaving the sum of $22,000,000 to be paid by the local interests.
> There was actually appropriated and expended the sum of $3,750,000 by each of said State and Federal authorities; but the landowners not only contributed the full amount under the basis of apportionment but, in order to avail themselves of the full benefit to accrue from the completion of the project, have expended, including the flood-control works, a total of practically $100,000,000. The great portion of such expenditures was made in the reclamation of their lands through providing proper drainage, with the necessary outlets therefor; and in so doing they have burdened their farms with liens through which such funds were secured, and it becomes a matter of impossibility to secure additional moneys in such measure with which to provide for the completion of the project, without which no material value will be conferred upon their lands.
>
> While the distress in which the landowners of the Sacramento Valley find themselves makes a strong appeal to the sympathies, yet the real moving influence with the Flood Control Committee members—and which, I may say, extended to the membership of the House—was in the unfair apportionment of the costs originally, and the fact that, through certain changes in the plan of improvement, desirable beyond question, and made at the instance of the commission in charge of the project, it was found that the completion of the work would entail an aggregate expenditure of $51,030,425. The committee believed, in view of the interest of navigation and the general welfare involved, that a division of one-third each as between the Federal Government, the State of California, and the local interests, was a more equitable allocation of cost, and the rule obtaining under the provisions of the flood-control project on the Mississippi River. Therefore, the change was made in the basis of apportionment of cost of the bill reported from such committee, which measure became a law as the act of May 15, 1928.
>
> The provision of the law expressly limits the maximum contribution of the Government to $17,500,000; but out of the amount authorized—$4,370,000—amounts advanced by the State of California in excess of the contributions required by the act of 1917 were to be paid said State, thus equalizing the cost of the complete project in accordance with the changed apportionment; the amount as stated to be expended in the completion of the project, but in lieu of equivalent contributions by the State. This change was based on the recommendation of the débris commission in charge of the administration of flood control on the Sacramento River.
> The bill, in so far as the Sacramento project was concerned, received the unanimous approval and support of the Flood Control Committee of the House, and no opposition was offered to the section of the bill covering the Sacramento project in the debates on the floor of the House.

So I submit in conclusion, Senators, first, that the House has passed this bill. The House had its hearings; the House determined the facts; the House then sent the bill over to the Senate. The House did this upon the recommendation of the United States engineers; the House did it upon the recommendation of the Budget itself; the House did it because it is the law to-day; and the law ought not to be altered by an amendment by the committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I am a member of the Appropriations Committee. As a member of that committee, when this amendment was read to the committee, a large body of the committee being present, I was simply amazed that the United States was called upon to refund to California $600,000 and, in the end, $4,000,000. If we should set that precedent, it would open a Pandora's box which would bankrupt this Government.

If we refund to California $4,000,000 for the Sacramento River, which is a State river, why not refund to Louisiana a billion dollars which the taxpayers of that State have raised for the Mississippi River? Why not appropriate to Arkansas, why not appropriate to Mississippi, the millions and millions and millions of dollars the taxpayers of those States have raised among themselves for that river? Why not refund to the South $68,000,000 of direct tax that was levied by this Government when we were in dire distress, that all the lawyers of this country know was an unconstitutional act? Why not refund to the State of Virginia a billion dollars for the sale of public lands which she reserved in her deed when she deeded to the Government the Northwest Territory? Why not give back to North Carolina the receipts from the sale of public lands in Tennessee when we ceded the land for the new State to the Government, the State of North Carolina reserving to herself all proceeds derived from the sale of public lands? Those States have not received a cent and are not asking for a cent.

Senators, see where we are going and where this is leading to. That was the reason why, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, I moved to strike out this appropriation, notwithstanding it was sent down by the Budget Bureau. Why was it sent down by the Budget Bureau?

Because it had been authorized by Congress. Are we bound by every authorization of Congress? Not infrequently in the Appropriations Committee we have before us a law in which an appropriation is authorized; but when we see that it is improper to appropriate the money we do not do it, and that is the reason. The duty is committed to us of going into this question to see whether this money ought to be appropriated.

Therefore, Mr. President, not knowing any of the facts but that the bill itself stated that this money should be refunded to California for money already spent on the Sacramento River, why should we replace this fund? I could not see any reason for it; and I am telling Senators the reasons that I gave then and that I give now, and the reason why the committee struck out the provision.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, just a few words.

The hearings in the House were very brief with reference to this item. I think some of the members of the committee, at any rate, voted to strike out this item in the hope of securing an explanation of the situation on the floor and in the discussion of the bill.

I have given as much study to this matter as I have had the time to give since it was reported, and I have not any doubt whatever about $3,750,000 of this sum. The remainder is not as clear to me as I should like to have it.

I find that in the Débris Commission's report, which is referred to in section 13 of the act of 1928, and which was adopted by Congress, there is a recommendation that there should be refunded to the State of California $3,750,000. This grows out of the expenditure of money by the State of California for the benefit of the channel of the Sacramento River and the construction of weirs in aid of navigation. It was recommended by the Débris Commission. Whether that recommendation was good or ill I am not going now to discuss. It was recommended by the commission. That specific amount was set out.

For instance, on page 38 of this report, it says:

> Following is a summary of the division of the cost corresponding to the recommended physical division of the work:
> * * * * * * *
> (6) To be reimbursed by the State of California on account of funds heretofore contributed to channel work and weir construction—
>
> Two phases of the work that were especially connected with navigation—
> $3,750,000.

So that that phase of it is clear.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what is the Débris Commission? Who appoints it, and how many men are on it?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the President appoints them. They are appointed from the United States Engineers. The Senate confirms them. There are three members of the California Débris Commission.

Mr. JONES. Here are the members of the commission who signed this report:

Herbert Deakyne, colonel, Corps of Engineers, president. He is now Assistant Chief of Engineers.

U. S. Grant, 3d, major, Corps of Engineers, secretary.

H. A. Finch, major, Corps of Engineers.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. If we assume this debt and undertake to pay it, ought we not to assume the debt of Mississippi that she has bonded her State to pay for improvement of the Mississippi River, which is an interstate river, and the work on which is carried on by commissioners appointed by the President? If this precedent is established is there any reason why we should not pay back to Mississippi the great sum of money she has paid on her rivers?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am rather inclined to think that the situation and the conditions are different; but that is a proposition that will have to be passed upon on its merits when it comes up. Here is a situation that we have actually passed on. We have, by solemn legislation, adopted this modified report of the Débris Commission; and I think by that act we have obligated the National Government to pay what is promised or what we said we should pay in the report which we have adopted.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean that every authorization bill constitutes a promise which must be carried out in this year's appropriation bill?

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; I am not talking about the $1,000,000 item, especially. I am talking more about the $4,370,000 item; and I do not say that we have to appropriate all that money in this bill, either. I did not hear all the discussion of the Senator from California, but I am referring to that phase of it, as to whether or not it is just, whether or not there is any obligation on our part to pay that $4,370,000.

I will admit that we could appropriate half of this at this time if we saw fit to do it, or we could appropriate a smaller amount, or we could refuse to appropriate anything now; but that would not discharge our obligation.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another question?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I notice at page 209 of the House hearings that this statement is made by General Jadwin, the Chief of Engineers:

> The flood control act of May 15, 1928, adopted the recommendations in the report of the California Débris Commission. The board of engineers and the Chief of Engineers did not concur in this report. The board of engineers recommended that the project be modified so as to provide for increasing the contribution of the Federal Government from $5,600,000 to $6,620,000 without the return of any funds to the State of California.

Did the Senator know that at the time his committee reported out this flood control bill?

Mr. JONES. I will frankly say to the Senator that I do not think we did. Section 13 was put in the flood control bill in the House, and came over here as a part of the bill. Our hearings, of course, were directed to the flood situation on the Mississippi River; and I will say frankly to the Senator that this matter was not investigated particularly. Several of us did not really want to include the Sacramento in that bill, but appeals were made to have that done, and of course we sympathized with the condition of our friend, a Member of the House from California; and I will frankly say to the Senator that we accepted the House language without any particular study or investigation.

Mr. GLASS. So that it was not, after all, so solemnly and seriously and deliberately done?

Mr. JONES. Except as legislation is enacted.

Mr. GLASS. I confess, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, that I knew nothing of this, and particularly did not know of what has just been read by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Army engineers were in disagreement with the report of this commission.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, let us understand this, if the Senator will yield to me.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator know that frequently the Appropriations Committee turns down an amount that is authorized on the ground that it is wrong?

Mr. JONES. I do not know of any case where that is done under circumstances like these. Let me say to the Senator that in addition to being authorized, this, I take it, is really an agreement created by statute.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is a statute authorizing it, but we are not bound by authorizations. Not longer ago than yesterday in the Appropriations Committee we declined to recommend an appropriation to settle the judgment of a court, or it was held up in conference, although the statute authorized it to be paid. It was held up because it was wrong, and the committee saw that it was wrong, and we turned it down.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Washington one or two more questions, if he will bear with me. Will the Senator tell us whether any member of the Committee on Commerce knew that this flood control act of 1928 called for the repayment to California of what she had spent?

Mr. JONES. Of course, I am not disposed to disclose what took place in the committee, but I will frankly say that the matter was not discussed in the committee. I have no doubt but that the Senator from California, who is a member of the committee, is probably familiar with the terms, but it was not discussed in the committee.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Was it discussed on the floor?

Mr. JONES. No; it was not.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me say a word as to the amount the Senator from Washington has asked. It is explained to me that the increase from the $3,700,000 to the $4,300,000 arises from what has happened in the interim between the time the first estimate was made and the present time. I have the report of the Budget here showing that $400,000 yearly has been appropriated by the State of California since the first estimate was made.

Mr. JONES. I had understood that that accounted for the $4,370,000. But there is nothing in the House hearings to indicate how much has actually been paid in. I understand that the Budget sent an estimate down, and that no further investigation was made into it by the House committee, and nothing has been furnished by the Budget to disclose what showing was made to the Budget which led it to arrive at the $4,370,000. I am sure, just as the Senator from California says, that this was paid in by the State during the years that have intervened since this report was made and up to the time of its adoption in 1928.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator permit one more question?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I notice in the same testimony to which I called the Senator's attention a further statement by General Jadwin after he had said that the Chief of Engineers and the Board of Engineers did not agree with this Débris Commission report. He said:

> When the matter came up before the Flood Control Committee last year—

I presume he meant the Flood Control Committee of the House considering the Mississippi River bill.

Mr. JONES. I assume so.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. He said:

> a former junior member of the California Débris Commission was called upon to testify, but the committee did not have before it any representative of the Chief of Engineers or the Board of Engineers.

May I ask, did the Commerce Committee of the Senate have before it any representative of the Chief of Engineers?

Mr. JONES. We had representatives of the Board of Engineers, but I think I said to the Senator a moment ago that we did not consider this item in the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. Who would know better, may I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, concerning the report, than the members of the Débris Commission, who are Government Engineers themselves?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Undoubtedly they would know all about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. They would know. The Senator will see that Jadwin was asked, "This is the law, is it not, and it has to be done?" And he said, "It is the law, and it has to be done." That is all there is to it.

The Senator will recall the differences that existed in the Committee on Commerce and among the members of the engineering department concerning the Mississippi project, and into that I do not desire to go. Here is a law that is fixed, and here is practically a contract that is made, and which ought to be carried out, I submit.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, this Débris Commission report is very clear with reference to the $3,750,000. I find this near the close of the report, where it summarizes its recommendations. This language is used in recommendation (f):

That the United States return to the State of California the amounts which shall have been expended on the project by the California Débris Commission from funds contributed by the State at the time of the adoption of these recommendations.

As I understand, it is contended that that language is a promise of a return to California of the proportionate part of the funds that have been expended since 1925, and is in addition to the $3,750,000. I think there is some room for doubt with reference to that, but that was the basis on which the $4,370,000 was arrived at.

I am not here to say whether this Débris Commission report was justified or not. It was made by very competent Army engineers, there is no doubt about that. They were on the ground, and I think they were really more familiar with the situation than anybody else. They recommended the change in the project and the estimate of cost. They held that the United States Government should pay the cost of the channel improvements and the weir construction, which was largely for the improvement of navigation, and it was upon the basis of that that they recommended the repayment of this money to California as the part which California had expended on purely navigation work.

I take the position myself that where we have passed what I might call a solemn legislative act, adopting a proposition, so long as that is the law we should carry it out.

Mr. GLASS. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, we did not do it solemnly. We did not even do it on sufficient information. The Senator has admitted here that he knew nothing about it himself, and that his committee did not consider it.

Mr. JONES. That, in my judgment, does not vitiate a contract of this nature. We probably are subject to criticism because we acted in that way, but I take it none the less this is a statutory agreement, if you do not want to call it a solemn agreement, a statutory agreement between the United States and California.

Mr. GLASS. I do not think it takes on the form of a contract. I think Congress upon fuller information might vitiate the statute.

Mr. JONES. I think that might be justifiable if California had not gone on and actually expended its money for work which is peculiarly within the province of the National Government; that is, the improvement of navigation. That is what they expended the money for, the improvement of navigation on the Sacramento River, in connection with flood control.

Mr. GLASS. I fail to note the obligation of the Government to carry into effect a statute that was confessedly adopted without any information and without any consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON. There were hearings.

Mr. JONES. I think the statement of the Senator from Virginia is hardly correct. I assume that the House gave this careful study and investigation. I assume that.

Mr. GLASS. But the Senate is a part of the legislative branch of the Government.

Mr. JONES. That is true.

Mr. GLASS. And the Senator confesses that the Senate gave no consideration to it.

Mr. JONES. That is the fact. I could not deny it, because it is a fact.

Mr. GLASS. If the Government is so flush with funds and so generously disposed as to make refunds of this kind, I think I will present a bill on behalf of Virginia, under the Jamison survey, and have the Government pay us back for all of the territories we ceded to the Government, containing whole blocks of States.

Mr. JONES. If the Senator can present what might be termed "a contract," or "statutory agreement," between the National Government and the State of Virginia——

Mr. GLASS. The obligation there is a great deal more definite than the one under consideration here.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, a clause in the deed reserves to Virginia all money derived from the sale of public lands in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois—five States in that section—and the Government never has paid her a cent.

Mr. JOHNSON. If it is just, why should it not be refunded?

Mr. OVERMAN. It ought to be refunded.

Mr. JOHNSON. If it is just, why should it not be?

Mr. OVERMAN. The State is not asking for it, and I am surprised at California.

Mr. JOHNSON. The mere fact that it has not asked would not militate against it in the slightest degree with me, if it were a just thing to do.

Mr. OVERMAN. It would bankrupt the Government.

Mr. JONES. I think I agree with the Senator from California. I stated briefly my position in regard to the matter and what has led me to approve, at least to the extent of $3,750,000, this item. As I have said, I have a doubt about the other, but unless we are going to revoke this statutory promise or agreement, then we should carry it out. Of course, it is for the Senate to determine whether it is going to do that.

Mr. OVERMAN. How would we revoke it? Would not the refusal to give this appropriation be in effect a revocation?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I think that would be in effect a revocation of it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The question is, then, whether we want to revoke it or not.

Mr. JONES. I think that is really the question.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce a question. I notice in the report made by the House Flood Control Committee that they deal with this question, and it would seem to me in their report they specifically obligate the Federal Government to pay the money.

Mr. JONES. The Senator refers to the House report on the flood control bill?

Mr. HARRISON. The House report on the flood control bill.

Mr. JONES. I have not examined that; but, as I said awhile ago, I have no doubt but that they looked into it.

Mr. HARRISON. After dealing with it to some extent they say:

The State of California, by legislation passed in 1925, has already approved the proposed reapportionment of cost and has obligated itself to pay a full one-third of the cost on condition that the United States assume a corresponding obligation.

All sums heretofore appropriated by the State or Nation in aid of the project are to be credited against the one-third proposed to be assumed, and the balance is to be provided by installment appropriations.

I think a careful reading of the report shows that we did obligate ourselves to pay this one-third.

Mr. JONES. I might say this also, that in this provision adopting the California débris project it is expressly provided, in section 13, that "the amount so contributed by the Federal Government shall in no event exceed $17,600,000."

Whatever we appropriate here is, of course, included in that $17,600,000. If we do not appropriate a cent, the chances are that this work will not be concluded, though the National Government has spent $17,600,000 on it, while if we should put the full amount in here it diminishes the $17,600,000 by just that amount.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 81, line 14, to strike out "$1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$400,000."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The amendment that was debated was the amendment to strike out lines 15 to 22, inclusive, on page 81.

Mr. JOHNSON. The other was debated as well. Will we dispose of the first one by a viva voce vote?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I suggest that they be acted on together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments were debated together, but the one the Chair stated first came first. That is why he stated it first.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Then we will let the vote proceed on the first amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am a little in doubt as to the amendment upon which we are called on to vote. Does it include all of the items in the paragraph?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are two separate amendments, as I understand it, on page 81. One is on line 14, to strike out "$1,000,000" and to insert "$400,000." The second amendment is to strike out lines 15 to 22, inclusive. The two amendments were debated together. Of course, the Senate can vote on both at once, or vote on them separately.

Mr. JONES. I think they should be voted on separately.

Mr. McNARY. Of course, that could be done by unanimous consent. I should not oppose that method of expediting the proposition, but I thought the controversy was more particularly with reference to the amount of money to be returned to California than the amount of money which properly would be carried in the bill for development work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the Senator is correct.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, as the roll call has not yet been proceeded with, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate vote now by roll call on the refund proposition which is covered by the amendment in lines 15 to 22 on page 81.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, withholding for the moment my consent, I want to make an observation probably due to the parliamentary condition which now presents itself, and also as to the division of the question and the remarks made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

As I understand the argument, there are two points involved, one the question of the appropriation to continue the work under the flood control act, and the other as to the sum of money that should be returned to the State of California which it had advanced over and above the amount which it was anticipated should be advanced by reason of the action of the Congress.

On the general proposition I can not see any difference between the amount of money that is to be appropriated for California under the flood control act and the amount of money which was so liberally appropriated last year to the States along the Mississippi River.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, did the Senator refer to me just now?

Mr. McNARY. Only in a very gentle and very kindly way. I was stating as a matter of principle, because of an observation made by my distinguished and lovable friend from North Carolina, that I can not understand where there is any distinction to be had between the amount of money which is to be appropriated directly out of the Treasury of the United States to take care of flood control and navigation of the Sacramento River and the money last year so abundantly and generously appropriated by the Congress for the same thing on the Mississippi River.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in the first place I contend——

Mr. McNARY. If the Senator will just wait a moment, I will thank him. I have not finished. My statement is not in the nature of an inquiry, but more in the nature of an observation.

The practice has been for a long while, as to all navigable streams, for the Congress to appropriate money for both flood control and navigation. Sometimes they are quite apart and sometimes they are blended. In this particular case in so far as affects the Sacramento River they are united in one common purpose. I say there is no difference in principle between the appropriating of money for flood-control work and navigation on the Sacramento River in California and the money that was appropriated last year for flood control and navigation on the Mississippi River.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Would the Senator be willing to vote for a bill refunding to the States along the Mississippi River the immense amounts of money which they have paid in years heretofore for flood control?

Mr. McNARY. What I have done probably is indicative of my state of mind. As ranking member of the Committee on Commerce last year I voted to place the whole burden on the Federal Government in connection with flood control on the Mississippi River.

Mr. GLASS. That relates to future control. What I am asking the Senator is whether he would vote for a bill presented here to refund to those various States the enormous amounts of money which they respectively and in the aggregate have expended for flood control.

Mr. McNARY. Yesterday, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I reported favorably a bill which provides that money shall be given by the Federal Government to four Southern States adjacent to the Mississippi River because of the destruction of their roads.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator does not answer my question at all.

Mr. McNARY. I am answering it by citing things that have occurred here and not by answering a hypothetical question. To the Senator's hypothesis I will say yes, if he will come in here with a bill which is fair and shows that the Government has been unjust to those Commonwealths, it will receive my support.

Mr. GLASS. I take it from the Senator's position that the Government has been unjust about it in not refunding the enormous amounts of money which have been expended in years past for flood control on the Mississippi River.

Mr. McNARY. In the first place, I tried to distinguish the two thoughts involved in the question on which we are about to vote. I am not talking about a refund proposition at all. I am talking about the principle involved in the flood-control work and the navigation development on the Sacramento River in California.

Mr. GLASS. But the item now before us involves a refund.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. JONES. The refund, as I understand it, is not for money expended for flood control but it is for money expended by California in particular navigation work, in the control of channels and the construction of weirs.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me, in answer to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is because the proportions which have been heretofore allocated in California are different from the proportions which were allocated on the Mississippi River. In making the proportion one-third, one-third, and one-third, the amount that has been expended for the United States Government in weirs and the like is returned to the State to be expended on the project and taken out of the full amount that is to be expended from the one-third contributed by the Government upon that work.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, does the Senator mean that this money was not expended for flood control?

Mr. JOHNSON. It was spent for flood control, but in the construction of weirs and the like and in respect to navigation as well. It was expended by the United States Government as it saw fit, because its officials had absolute jurisdiction over the expenditure of the funds.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The amendment we are now discussing represents funds contributed for flood control?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is quite true.

Mr. McNARY. I only rose because of the remarks made by the distinguished and able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], intimating that this proposal presents a unique principle in legislation. I again say that it is different from the legislation enacted last year only in the sense that in the legislation enacted last year with respect to flood control on the Mississippi River the Government assumes all the financial burden. In controlling the flood waters of the Sacramento River under the act of 1928 the Government assumes only one-third of the financial burden, the other two-thirds falling on the State and the private property adjacent to the river.

Carrying that analogy further, in all our harbor-control work the same principle has been involved, much to the injustice of the West. Out of the millions and hundreds of millions of dollars, which have been expended by the Federal Government in the deepening of the rivers and harbors throughout the country, many of our eastern harbors have been improved at the sole and exclusive expense of the Federal Government, whereas as to the West there has grown up a policy which has been cruel and injurious, requiring that the ports in those Western States, wherein more than half of the land is publicly owned and untaxed and untaxable, shall pay one-half of the expense for the development of the rivers and harbors.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I believe the principle stated by the Senator is correct, and as to the future I agree with the Senator, but the Senator is bound to admit that this proposition was not considered in committee at all and was not considered in the Senate when it was passed. It was done out of consideration for a very distinguished and able Senator who was ill at the time, and it was not given any particular consideration. It was done without consideration by the Senate or by the committee.

I do not think a sectional question ought to be brought into the matter. I say that if this is established as a precedent it will bankrupt the Federal Government, because if we pay the State of California in this case, we ought to pay the States along the Mississippi River where they have almost bankrupted themselves in order to provide for navigation, and flood control, too.

Mr. McNARY. It comes back to the point I stated a moment ago. I am not discussing that phase of the problem which is presented in the matter of the return to California of certain proceeds paid in advance, which is based upon the act of 1917; but for the purposes of flood control and navigation, I repeat, the precedent is as old as the Congress of the United States.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. HAWES. The Senator is a member of the Commerce Committee of the Senate. I think perhaps I may refresh his recollection. The whole flood-control matter was discussed for months in the House, beginning, I believe, in November. Voluminous testimony was taken there, as a result of which the Senate hearings were not long and fewer witnesses were called, because we, in our judgment, relied upon the testimony taken on the House side. I think it would be an unfair statement to charge the great Commerce Committee, with 19 Senators on it, with having passed on the bill without due consideration. We relied upon the testimony taken before the House committee.

Mr. McNARY. I have made no such charge as that.

Mr. HAWES. I know the Senator did not; but it has been suggested here that we passed upon the matter without investigation. It would be quite an unfair assumption to say that that was correct. Our hearings on the flood control bill were brief, because we had the benefit of the testimony taken on the House side. Is it the Senator's recollection of the attitude of the Senate committee that we relied upon the testimony taken on the House side?

Mr. McNARY. To a very large extent. As I recall, there was no one on the committee not familiar and particularly conversant with the whole situation, and I do not recall that any hasty action was taken in the matter whatsoever. I think we made a very thorough study of the whole subject.

Mr. HAWES. So the matter was given consideration by the Committee of Commerce, on which we have 19 members?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Was not this paragraph put in the bill by amendment on the floor of the House and not by the House committee?

Mr. HAWES. I do not know whether it was or not. I know the facts were discussed before our committee, and there were voluminous hearings on the subject on the House side.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not care further to prolong the debate. I only ask now in what fashion the matter will be presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania has asked unanimous consent that the vote be taken on the amendment on page 81, to strike out from line 15 down to and including line 22. Upon that amendment the yeas and nays were ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. McNARY. That was the request for unanimous consent submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Chair state that it is on the committee amendment that we are about to vote? Those who favor the committee amendment, of course, will vote "yea" and those who wish to reject it and retain the House provision will vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is correct.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have been attending a committee meeting and have just come to the Chamber. I understand that the proposition upon which we are about to vote involves the payment to California of a considerable sum which it is alleged has been expended by the State upon one of the rivers arising within its borders and flowing into the Pacific Ocean. It does not relate to matters in futuro, but matters which are in the past. It establishes a precedent of vital importance, one which may cost the Government hundreds of millions of dollars. The able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has just said that as to the future he has accepted the proposition that the Government should assume the responsibility of caring for flood control, but that he is not supporting the proposition for the payment to the States of the vast sums heretofore contributed by them to care for the streams within their borders, or streams which may be interstate in character.

It seems to me that we have gone too far and have been too generous, even in accepting the view of the Senator, that the United States shall pay for all flood control in the future. Now, when we are asked to refund to one State—and, of course, if we refund to one we must refund to all—expenditures made by it for its own benefit upon a stream within its borders, it is certain that all States will demand similar treatment. Where shall we draw the line? The statute of limitations can not be pleaded, or would not be pleaded, if this policy is adopted, and it would be immoral to deny to other States what they have expended if we reimburse California for what it has expended. I recall, a few years ago, that after the great flood in Ohio, one of the cities bonded itself and expended thirty or forty million dollars for the purpose of meeting the situation. We shall be called upon to refund, with interest, to the city of Dayton that amount if this plan is followed. I know other States that have made contributions under similar circumstances. Are we now to establish the precedent that the Federal Government is to be charged with all expenditures which have been made; that it not only assumes all future burdens resulting from the control of the Mississippi and all other streams throughout all the United States, but we are to go back into the musty records of the past and dig up every appropriation which has been made by every State, county, and municipality, and reimburse such States, counties, and municipalities for the appropriations made? It does seem to me that it would be most unwise and most unjust to do so.

With respect to the bill under which this authorization was made, I do not recall that the subject was mentioned upon the floor of the Senate; I doubt if half a dozen Senators knew anything about it. I never heard of it until to-day when it was suggested that there was an item in the appropriation bill for the purpose indicated. I feel sure, Mr. President, that if the Senate had known of the principle involved in this proposed amendment, the principle involved in the authorization to which reference is made, the bill would not have been passed in that form.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. May I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the statute were passed—and it is before us—and the work was done and the money expended pursuant to that statute; in a word, if there was an agreement on the part of the Federal Government to reimburse or contribute this amount, does the Senator from Utah hold that we have a right to violate that agreement and understanding?

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from California contend that this $5,000,000 plus—and I have not been able to be present to hear all the discussion, and I am only speaking in an informal way—has been spent since we passed the bill last spring?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; but I contend, as I understand the position, that the Federal Government obligated itself by virtue of its duly authorized agents.

Mr. KING. When?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not recall the exact date.

Mr. KING. The Senator from California certainly knows that the flood control act was passed May 13, 1928, and the Senator can not contend that this expenditure was made by the State of California between the 13th of May, 1928, and the present time. If a statute had been passed in May under which expenditures were authorized by California and, pursuant to such authorization, expenditures had been made and the United States agreeing to meet them, then the Federal Government should assume the obligation. No expenditure, as I am advised, has been made by California under this authorization. Now to dig up the past and make this appropriation seems to me unwise and a dangerous precedent.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, it would appear to me that there may be some avenue of escape from this situation in which the Congress has been placed respecting the authorization of a refund to the State of California. I remember the day on which we gave consideration to the Mississippi flood control bill. The bill was passed by almost a unanimous vote. I believe the RECORD will show that at least no debate occurred upon the question of policy involved. We have justified in one instance the authorization for an appropriation of public funds out of the Treasury of the United States to repay to a State moneys that the State has expended on flood control or, for that matter—it does not make any difference—for the purpose of navigation. So we are in this situation: Having entered upon that policy, it would seem to me that we are in duty bound, in fairness to all the other States of the Union, to authorize the payment of refunds to those States which have expended money for the same or similar purposes.

I am quite sure that my State has expended money upon two or three rivers that are wholly within the State of Wisconsin for flood control, and, of course, it naturally follows, in the interest of navigation; but I never had any conception that it was the duty of the Federal Government to reimburse my State. Having once established the precedent, however, are we not, Mr. President, in duty bound to authorize appropriations for every State which has expended money for these purposes or like purposes?

It would seem to me that perhaps the only way out of this dilemma would be to suspend action upon this problem until the Congress has an opportunity to determine upon the policy to be followed and to decide whether or not this is going to be the future policy. If it is, that is one thing and we will very willingly abide by that policy; but if that is not going to be the future policy of the United States, we ought to know it now before we vote some four or five million dollars for the benefit of a single State of the Union.

If the Senator from California can demonstrate that we should embark upon a policy of refunding to the States moneys which they have expended for the purposes covered by this amendment, if he can demonstrate that that is a correct policy, I should be inclined to follow him. I do not know that he now contends that that should be the policy. As I understand, he now contends that there is an authorization of law in this instance, and therefore we are obligated to make this appropriation. I confess that under the circumstances there may be an obligation for Congress to make an appropriation to carry out the authorization, but if the authorization should not have been made, if the policy should not have been initiated, if we are not going to continue that policy, then I think we can very well suspend action upon this particular item until Congress shall have had the opportunity to debate it and settle the entire policy for the future.

While I have been inclined to vote for the appropriation, I have very strong convictions that it would be much safer now to suspend action on this proposition until the opportunity may be afforded to the Congress to pass upon the general policy of whether or not we are going to make refunds in connection with money expended for flood control, for the improvement of navigation, and perhaps for other similar purposes or purposes so closely related that the same problem is involved.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like a little further information about this matter. I have before me here the act of May 15, 1928, and I have been endeavoring to ascertain from it the justification for the statement made in the amendment under consideration that the payment of this sum to the State of California is authorized by that section. I find it difficult to spell out any such authorization. Section 13 of the act of May 15, 1928, reads as follows:

That the project for the control of floods in the Sacramento River, Calif., adopted by section 2 of the act approved March 1, 1917, entitled "An act to provide for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes," is hereby modified in accordance with the report of the California Débris Commission submitted in Senate Document No. 23, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session: Provided, That the total amounts contributed by the Federal Government, including the amounts heretofore contributed by it, shall in no event exceed in the aggregate $17,600,000.

That is rather a remarkable way of legislating—to provide that the act of March 1, 1917, "is hereby modified in accordance with the report of the California Débris Commission submitted in Senate Document No. 23, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session." We are obliged to go to Senate Document No. 23 in order to find out to what extent the act of 1917 is indeed modified. I am not sure about the efficacy of legislation of that character, but I can not understand how by such a reference as that the Congress of the United States should have obligated the Government to make this payment to the State of California.

I was likewise examining the act of March 1, 1917, which contemplated the improvement of the Sacramento River by the joint action of the State of California and the United States, each of them to pay one-half the cost. I should like to hear from the Senator sponsoring the amendment just how the United States has become obligated, as recited in this amendment, to pay this sum to the State of California?

Mr. JOHNSON. I shall be very glad, as best I can, to advise the Senator. It has been done heretofore twice; but the Senator has been absent from the Chamber, and therefore has not heard what has been said.

There are two governmental flood-control projects in the United States—first, the Mississippi River; secondly, the Sacramento River. Those are the two governmental flood-control projects.

Upon the Sacramento River, up to a certain period, the Government contributed one-sixth of the cost of the endeavor to improve navigation, control floods, and the like, the State and the landowners contributing the remainder. The burden that was put upon the landowners was altogether too great to be borne by them; and finally the project was suggested that in accordance with the rule prevailing in other territory the State should contribute one-third, the landowners one-third, and the United States Government one-third. This was suggested in a report of the California Débris Commission, which, the Senator will recall, is a commission consisting of United States engineers appointed by the President and appointed in respect of the Sacramento flood-control project. They recommended one-third, one-third, and one-third, and they recommended various other things in relation to appropriations and the like.

When the Mississippi flood control bill was before the House last year there were extensive hearings—an entire volume I have before me here—concerning the due proportionate sum that should be paid by each of the contributing parties, and generally concerning the entire flood-control project on the Sacramento. Before the House committee at that time, as before it since its rendition, has been the report that was rendered by the California Débris Commission, consisting of the three United States engineers, Denkyne, Grant, and Finch. Finally, last year—to make a long story on the subject as short as may be—the House, after its extensive hearings, adopted the report of these three engineers constituting the California Débris Commission, and wrote into the Mississippi flood control bill the language which the Senator has just read, section 13 thereof.

In the original estimates that were made for the Sacramento River flood-control project the United States engineers estimated $31,000,000, in round numbers, to be the amount required. Subsequently, by increase of costs and the like, they revised their figure, and made it $52,000,000 that would be required for the entire project. That is where the figure of $17,600,000 comes from—one-third of the amount that is to be paid by the National Government.

When the work had proceeded until practically the present time upon the other division, and the demonstration was complete that the burden was too great for the landowners, the House concluded, after its hearings, that some relief should be accorded. It did not increase at all the amount to be paid by the United States Government. It fixed the sum, $17,600,000, to be paid by the United States Government; but it said to the State and to the landowners, "You have paid a proportion in excess of that which has been paid in any other place or on any other project; and, therefore for the purposes of the project, we will refund the amount of that excess to be used ultimately upon the project; but it shall be deducted from the total sum of the one-third to be paid by the Government itself."

That is all that this refund is. It is not at all comparable to refunds of other sorts that are suggested.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not raised any question at all of the equity of the claim.

Mr. JOHNSON. All right.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But here is a recitation that we have already obligated ourselves by the act of May last.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes. The reason of that is because the act is construed by the engineers and by the Government and by the Budget as approving and adopting the provisions of the report of the California Débris Commission; and in that report, thus adopted, appear the two propositions that are the subject of discussion at this time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me inquire: In that report is there a declaration that the Government of the United States obligates itself to pay this amount to the State of California?

Mr. JOHNSON. The report is a recommendation that the Government now adopts for the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is a rather queer way to obligate the Government of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. That was done by the House, approved by the Senate, and passed; and not only that, but these items come——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Can the Senator call our attention to the language of the report that obligates the Government?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes. They are recommendations, as I said to the Senator. I will read them to the Senator:

(d) That the limit set on the contribution of the United States by the act of March 1, 1917, be increased from $5,600,000 to $17,700,000, including what has already been appropriated.

(e) That annual appropriations be increased from $500,000 to $1,000,000, the limit set by existing law, so as to permit completion of the work within a reasonable time.

(f) That the United States return to the State of California the amount which shall have been expended on the project by the California Débris Commission from funds contributed by the State, at the time of adoption of these recommendations.

Those are the recommendations carried into the act by section 13.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. Do I understand him as saying that in 1917 the Congress adopted a project for flood control upon the Sacramento River by which it was agreed or stipulated that the Government should pay one-third of that expense?

Mr. JOHNSON. My recollection is that it was one-sixth.

Mr. SIMMONS. Who was to pay the other five-sixths?

Mr. JOHNSON. The State and the landowners.

Mr. SIMMONS. Did Congress at any future time modify that project so as to provide that the Government should pay one-third of that expense?

Mr. JOHNSON. By the Mississippi flood control act in May, 1928.

Mr. SIMMONS. In that act they provided that Congress should pay one-third of the expense instead of one-sixth?

Mr. JOHNSON. We specifically modified it in that act in accordance with the recommendation of the Débris Commission.

Mr. SIMMONS. Was that act so drawn as to make that agreement on the part of the Government retroactive?

Mr. JOHNSON. The act itself adopts the recommendations of the Débris Commission.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does that commission's report recommend that the Government assume one-third of the expense?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. From the initiation of the project?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir; and refund the excess that had been paid by the landowners and the State. That was the idea of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Am I correct in supposing that the Sacramento River lies almost entirely in the State of California?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think wholly so.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator know of any other case where the Government has undertaken flood control of a stream lying entirely within one State?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not; but, as I endeavored to explain in opening on this matter, this arose out of the peculiar circumstance of hydraulic mining.

Some hundreds of millions of dollars were taken out of the California hills by hydraulic mining; but the process of hydraulic mining washed down great mountains in the State of California into this river, which was one of the great commercial streams of the country; and finally the bitterness between the farmer in the valley and the miner on the hill became so great that court actions repeatedly were tried, and ultimately the United States court rendered its famous injunction in the North Bloomfield case restraining hydraulic mining. Then to Congress came those who were interested in taking gold from the hills there, and they asked that the Congress of the United States, because of the extraordinary benefits derived from the mining of the gold, take hold of the problem and in some fashion remedy the situation existing; and then was passed what was termed "the Caminetti Act," providing for licensing, under certain conditions, for taking care of the tailings of the mines, hydraulic mining; and then came the United States Government, with its Débris Commission—that is where it gets its name, the California Débris Commission—to take care, so far as it could, of the navigability of the river, flood control, and the like.

That has been the process now for 45 years past.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator, then, thinks that those conditions differentiate that stream from other streams that may overflow their banks and do damage?

Mr. JOHNSON. Generally speaking; yes, sir—oh, I do, indeed; and it is differentiated in the fact of the proportionate cost that has been put upon the landowners there. At no other place has there been such a proportionate cost.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator expect to get a vote upon this question this afternoon? The reason why I ask is that I have a matter of very great importance for the consideration of which I desire to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. SIMMONS. May I say to the Senator that that rests with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. A vote by yeas and nays has already been ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have not yielded the floor. I have asked these questions of the Senator from California for the purpose of trying to elicit information which might differentiate the situation with respect to the Sacramento River from that of other streams originating and running wholly through one State. The Government has never undertaken, so far as I know, up to the time of the passage of the provision with reference to this particular river, to contribute toward flood control of these local streams.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator is quite right; and, if the Senator will permit me, there are just two national flood-control projects existing to-day, the Mississippi River project and the Sacramento River project.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator recognizes, however, that those two streams differ entirely from each other. The Mississippi River is transcontinental in its sweep. It is of direct concern to about 21 States of the Union. It flows directly through many States of this Union. It is a national stream, not a State stream at all. Yet, when we assumed the burden of protecting the Mississippi River from floods, we left open the question of whether the Government should pay the whole of the expense, or should only cooperate with the States bordering the Mississippi River. That question has not yet been decided.

I must confess that, although I am a member of the Commerce Committee, this question with respect to the Sacramento River had entirely escaped me. It may be that the Government has committed itself with respect to this scheme upon the Sacramento River, because of the exceptional conditions outlined by the Senator from California. But I want it understood, if we shall enact this legislation, that this is an exceptional case, and is not intended to create a precedent by which the Government is hereafter to be bound.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to call attention to the fact that the Government appropriated money for reclamation——

Mr. SIMMONS. That is, reclamation of arid land. It has not appropriated any money for the reclamation of overflowed lands.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am trying to draw the analogy with this river. In that case it was admitted that there was no authority under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution to take charge of and impound the waters of the streams affected because they were not interstate streams. The question as to whether or not there was any constitutional authority in Congress to appropriate money to impound the waters of an intrastate stream went into the courts. The courts held that the power did exist in Congress, because Congress had control of the public lands of the United States; that it was within the power of Congress to dispose of those lands; and it followed that it was within the power of Congress to improve the lands so that it might dispose of them.

The gold and silver and other ores of the United States have constantly been reserved to the Federal Government. They have never passed to the States. These lands in the mountains of California which have been placer mined have been public lands. Most of them are public lands to-day. The gold that has been mined and is being mined is property of the Federal Government.

The Federal Government was interested in the development of these gold lands which it controlled and in the production of the gold of this country. That could only be accomplished by entering into a compact, so to speak, with the State of California, because placer mining as has been said was the only method by which the gold could be taken out, washing out the débris which filled up the rivers. The citizens of California have a right to protect the private property owners against the destruction of their property. Therefore we had reached the point where, unless the Federal Government would participate in the protection of the Sacramento River, the Federal Government could never develop its gold deposits in the mountains.

The theory upon which the appropriation was made by Congress, if it is constitutional—and I do not believe that question has been passed on—was the same theory on which it was held that the Congress had the constitutional right to appropriate money to impound waters in an intrastate stream; that is, for the purpose of utilizing and making valuable its public lands. This is the only way by which the Government of the United States can develop its placer-gold deposits in the mountains.

The question that appealed to Congress was this: Is the holding back of this débris worth the appropriation? Congress has held that these valuable deposits of placer gold justify the expenditure by the Government of so much money in holding back this débris from going down into the lower regions of the river. That is the distinction.

Unless the Government of the United States will do this thing, then those gold deposits, most of which are on Government land, and which are controlled by the Government of the United States, can never be developed, and that gold can not be taken out unless the Government will pay its part to prevent damage from that débris. That is the legal theory upon which this future appropriation is to be made.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator a question. Does the Senator mean that upon that theory the appropriation is justified for the future or the appropriation of $4,350,000 is justified as a refund?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is not the question I was going into, and I am probably not competent to answer that question, because I have not examined into the facts of the matter. That is simply a question of equity as between the State and the Federal Government, of which I know nothing. I am only trying to assist in the differentiation between attempting to appropriate money under the interstate commerce clause, and what is done here. It could not be done under that clause of the Constitution. It could not be done at all, in my opinion, except under the authority in Congress, as it has been sustained by the courts, to improve its own lands. I can not answer the other question.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator simply fortifies the position of the Senator from California with reference to the existence of an exceptional condition which might justify the Government pursuing a policy with reference to this river without establishing a precedent as to other streams which might sometimes overflow their banks and do damage by reason of floods.

I am not raising that question. I simply wanted to know whether there was any reason why the Government should pursue a policy with respect to this river which it has not pursued with respect to any other purely State stream. I accept the statement of the Senator from California and of the Senator from Nevada with respect to that.

There is another question which I asked the Senator from California that has not been satisfactorily answered to my mind; that is, whether, when the Government in this last enactment provided for a 3-3-3 division of the costs, it meant to make that proportion of contribution retroactive. The original legislation provided that the Government should pay one-sixth, as I understand, and a large amount of money was expended under that original project of which the Government was to pay one-sixth. Then the Government at a later date made another agreement by which it agreed to pay one-third. The question is, Does that latter enactment become retroactive and require the Government to pay one-third of the expense that might have been incurred prior to the enactment?

I would like to ask the Senator how much money had been expended between the time of the adoption of the one-sixth proposition and the adoption of the one-third proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am unable to tell the Senator, except that the sum that constitutes the amount that is stated to be a refund is the difference.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I had assumed—that that was the difference. Upon what theory does the Senator contend that when the Government had adopted a project, agreed to pay a certain amount of the cost of carrying out that project, and subsequently, after a large amount of money had been spent under that project and under that legislation, and there is a change in the amount to be contributed by the Government, the Government is obligated to pay the difference between the latter amount and the original amount it obligated itself to pay?

Mr. JOHNSON. Because that was the recommendation of the United States engineers, which was adopted and written into the law by the flood-control legislation.

Mr. SIMMONS. There may be a report of the United States engineers that does not at all conform to the judgment of Congress. But is there anything in the last enactment that provides that this one-third contribution shall be retroactive?

Mr. JOHNSON. Section 13 of the flood control act, passed in May, 1928, modifies the former flood control act by adopting the report of the engineers that is set forth in Senate Document 23, and that report provides, as I have read to the Senate, that—> the United States return to the State of California the amounts which shall have been expended on the projects by the California Débris Commission from funds contributed by the State at the time of the adoption of these recommendations.

That we have written into law; the Budget sends down the amount, the engineers approve it, and it is the law to-day. Do not think that it is an additional appropriation, for it is not. It comes out of the one-third that the Government is obligated to spend upon this project.

Mr. SIMMONS. If that language can be construed to mean that the Government now agrees that it will pay one-third of the expense from the initiation of the project, the Senator is right about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. It was so construed by the engineers, so construed by the Budget, so construed at the time it was adopted in the House. The hearings in the House are plenary, they are full and complete upon the subject. It is quite true that the subject was not gone into at the same length in the Senate, because we had before us the House hearings, which were very voluminous, and in the House the whole matter was gone into at great length.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I would like to know whether the act of Congress was passed after this money was expended of which refund is claimed, or whether the act of Congress was passed before the money was spent of which refund is asked.

Mr. JOHNSON. The money was spent before the act of last year was passed.

Mr. TYDINGS. The point is, the money was expended before there was any authority of the Congress to authorize any such expenditure?

Mr. SIMMONS. The money was expended under authority of the Government to contribute to the expense of this work to the extent of one-sixth of the cost.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. The act the Senator has just read, which was passed in 1928, was passed 11 or more years afterwards. That provides that the Government should pay one-third. The Senator from California contends that the language of this last enactment is so broad that it is retroactive and requires the Government to assume the burden of one-third from the initiation of the project.

Mr. TYDINGS. In other words, the difference of one-sixth is made retroactive by the act of 1928?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. But before the act of 1928 there was no governmental authority authorizing the expenditure of that one-sixth?

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, yes; there was governmental authority authorizing it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I mean the difference between one-sixth which was authorized and the one-third which was authorized in 1928.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; but the money was contributed by liens of the landowners, the State, and the like.

Mr. TYDINGS. But there is a sum of money which was expended without any act of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then I do not understand it yet.

Mr. JOHNSON. All the money was expended by the Débris Commission. It has charge and absolute domination over the expenditure of the money. The money that was expended was what the Government contributed, what the landowners contributed, and what the State contributed. To make the proportion now one-third, one-third, and one-third, $4,000,000 of the ultimate amount to be expended by the Government is returned. That is the story.

Mr. TYDINGS. The $4,000,000 is not yet authorized, is it?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; it is authorized by the flood control act of 1928.

Mr. TYDINGS. What part of the money authorized by the flood control act of 1928 will be used to replace money which has already been expended prior to the passage of that act?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is all going to be expended on the project.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is any of it a refund of money actually expended before the passage of the 1928 act?

Mr. JOHNSON. It may be termed a refund. It is for moneys expended prior to the 1928 act.

Mr. TYDINGS. And was not that money expended at a time when there was no congressional authorization for its expenditure?

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no.

Mr. TYDINGS. There was authorization for one-sixth?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. But for the one-sixth remaining, the difference between that and the one-third after the one-sixth was taken out, there was no authorization?

Mr. JOHNSON. But the money was expended from moneys contributed by the State and the landowners.

Mr. TYDINGS. But now we are repaying that one-sixth back to them for a period of 10 years, and therefore they had no authority, except by the act of 1928, to draw upon the Government for that one-sixth?

Mr. JOHNSON. They did not draw upon the Government.

Mr. TYDINGS. But they would have theoretically drawn upon the Government, because now we are going to give the money back which they spent without any congressional authority whatsoever.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no; it can not be said that they spent it without any congressional authority. The fact of the matter is that the Government did not appropriate that amount of money to be expended.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me state it in another way. In other words, there was no authorization for one-sixth of the money which was actually expended by the Federal Government until 1928, when it was made retroactive for those 10 years.

Mr. JOHNSON. But the Federal Government did not expend the money.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course not.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is, I mean by virtue of an appropriation.

Mr. TYDINGS. It acknowledges the debt?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. But at the time the debt was incurred there was no understanding that the Federal Government would make good that extra one-sixth?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is quite true; and in 1928 the Federal Government adopted the recommendation of the engineers and agreed to do it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is the point.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is retroactive. That is my point.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the whole question of what part the Government is going to contribute toward flood control in the country is an open question. Purposely and deliberately the act of 1928, providing for flood control on the Mississippi, left it open. It is left open not only as to the Mississippi River, which is a national stream, but, with the exception of the stream in California now under discussion, the Government has never done anything toward paying the expenses of flood control. I do not know whether the Government is so committed that it ought to pay one-third of this expense or not. It rather looks to me as if it were so committed. It looks to me as if there were some exceptional conditions which apply to that stream which might possibly justify it.

What I desire to present to the Senate is that the whole question is open and that I am very anxious to see it settled, but I do not wish to see it settled or regarded as settled by the action of the Senate in this particular case; in the first place, because the conditions were exceptional; and in the second place, I am satisfied that the Senate of the United States did not deliberately consider the question at the time it passed the 1928 act, upon which the Senator from California relies.

I believe that the Government of the United States ought to assume a part of the burden of flood control upon the great streams of the country, those which are interstate and those which are intrastate, because of the fact that the Government exercises absolute control over those streams; but I want that question left to the future. I think it is a question which challenges the serious consideration of the Senate and of the House and of the country as to what is the duty in the premises. Whatever may be the action here to-day in respect to this particular case I do not wish that it shall be considered as a precedent for the future.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I desire to make just a brief statement. If the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is correct in his statement of the facts, the whole case is boiled down into this statement: The Government of the United States owns and controls the gold and silver in the ground and in order to get that gold and silver out, it either directly, or through people it authorized, filled up this stream. What the people there are asking now is that the Government in part reimburse them for the damage the Government has done. That is about all there is in the case. That being the case, I think it a very exceptional one, and it seems to me, as a matter of equity and justice, that the Government ought to make good the loss.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if we can have a vote immediately on the question now before the Senate I am perfectly willing to yield for that purpose, but before doing so I want to make just a brief statement.

To-morrow morning the Shipping Board, so I have been told this afternoon, expects to sell 13 of the great ships of the North Atlantic Line, including the Leviathan, the George Washington, and others. On yesterday I introduced a resolution relating to this matter.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he will not wait until the vote is taken, if we can take it immediately?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will let the matter be voted upon in just a few moments, but I want to tell the Senators who are here what I propose to do. Then the vote may be taken.

I am going to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution to which I have referred, which simply refers the question of the sale of these vessels to the Commerce Committee of the Senate. The reason why I shall do it is that the sale is to be made to a firm called D. C. Chapman & Co. A Mr. Sheedy, a former employee of the board—I think it is only within the last year or two that he has become disassociated from the board—is to be one of the purchasers. He came to my office some weeks ago lobbying with reference to the measure.

The Shipping Board are making the sale, so I am reliably informed, without referring it to the Emergency Fleet Corporation, as in all other cases, for advice as to the various phases of the sale. They are hurrying the sale through to-morrow at 10 o'clock and unless the resolution is passed to-night the ships may be sold at that time. The Leviathan is to be sold for $6,000,000 or a little more, and it cost the Government just a year or so ago some $10,000,000 to recondition.

Let me say further to Senators that the proposed sale means that we shall sell some 13 vessels, worth probably $30,000,000 or $40,000,000, to this ex-employee of the shipping board for $4,000,000 in cash, and the balance of $12,000,000 on credit, with an obligation on the part of the Government to furnish three-fourths of the money necessary to build two more ships at a cost of $28,000,000 each. Therefore, if the sale goes through to-morrow it will obligate the Government to accept a cash consideration of $4,000,000 for 13 ships worth $30,000,000 or $40,000,000, to extend a credit of $12,000,000 more, and in addition to that to furnish the money amounting to $42,000,000 to build two more ships.

It seems to me this is a matter which ought to go to the Commerce Committee to be considered by that committee before the sale is made. I do not think it was the intention of the Congress at any time that all these great trans-Atlantic line ships should be sold. It is the only line the United States has on the North Atlantic. It is the only line the American people have in any way to control freight rates on the North Atlantic. It is the most important line to American shipping that can be imagined.

All I ask is that the matter be sent to the Committee on Commerce to determine whether this is a wise or an unwise sale at this time.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator how he proposes to stop the sale?

Mr. McKELLAR. By the adoption of the resolution which I have introduced, which provides as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be authorized and directed to investigate fully into each and all bids, and into all the phases and particulars thereof, now pending before the United States Shipping Board for the purchase and operation of the United States Lines and the steamships Leviathan, George Washington, America, Republic, President Harding, and President Roosevelt, and the American Merchant Line and the steamships American Farmer, American Banker, American Shipper, American Merchant, and American Trader, and/or for the construction and/or reconditioning of new ships or existing ships, and into forecasts of the commercial results reasonably to be expected from the operation of such ships.

That full authority is hereby vested in said committee to hold all hearings, whenever and wherever deemed necessary, for said purposes, to require the production of records, documents, and other writings, to swear witnesses, and to take such other steps as may be found by said committee to be proper.

That pending further action by the Senate the United States Shipping Board is hereby requested to withhold making any sale of said steamships or said services, or to enter into contracts for the construction of new ships, or reconditioning of existing ships, for the use in such services.

Mr. President, my reason for bringing the matter up at this time is because another Senator has just informed me that he had just talked to a member of the Shipping Board and was told that the plan is to put the sale through in the morning at 10 o'clock, and unless the Senate takes action to-day on my resolution the sale will go through.

What the reliability of D. C. Chapman Co. (Inc.) is I do not know; but it is unquestioned—I have it from his own lips—that Mr. Sheedy, whose initials I do not know, a former employee of the board and who is apparently the principal promoter of this scheme, is the real purchaser. I have been informed, though I can not say positively that it is so, that D. C. Chapman Co. (Inc.), the proposed purchaser, is not a shipping concern at all, but that it is a bonding or real-estate concern in the State of New York. Evidently it is a promotion scheme, pure and simple. In my judgment, if the sale goes through, it will go through simply on paper. The United States will put up the enormous sum of at least $54,000,000 to make a paper sale of this kind, on which it will receive a first payment of $4,000,000.

Under those circumstances I appeal to the Senate for unanimous consent to adopt this resolution this afternoon, because I know if it shall be adopted the Shipping Board will not complete the sale to-morrow. The chairman of the committee is here; he can hold the hearing speedily; there will be no harm done by the investigation proposed. If D. C. Chapman & Co. are all right, if Mr. Sheedy is all right, if the sale is all right, the committee can bring back its report to the Senate, and there will be no further controversy about it. On the other hand, if it is examined into and found not to be a proper sale, then it should not be consummated.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. A few months ago we passed a shipping bill which, as I understood, was designed to contribute to the building up of an American merchant marine, even if it had to be done by the Government. I do not understand the necessity for the sale of the American lines. What is the occasion for it?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know. The members of the Shipping Board constantly give out to the public statements that it is the policy of the board to get rid of them as soon as possible, whether the consideration offered is reasonable or unreasonable, as I understand.

Mr. BARKLEY. Was that the policy of the bill over which we had such a controversy at the last session?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think so; I did not construe it in that way, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I assume that no Member of this body has been more insistent on putting the Government ships in the hands of private owners than I have; I believe in private operation of the merchant marine; but I have been somewhat concerned, to tell the truth, over the proposal to sell practically all of the great ships that we have left. I should want to be very sure, as a Member of the Senate and of the Commerce Committee, that it is a wise thing to do. We have had no opportunity to examine into it or ask any questions. I am therefore heartily in favor of the proposal made by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to state further in regard to what the Senator from New York has just said that as soon as I learned several days ago that it was proposed to sell these ships speedily I offered a resolution asking for the facts. The report on that resolution reached the Senate only a day or two ago, and it went immediately to the Printing Office. I have tried all during the day to have that report sent up here. It ought to be here before any action is taken on the sale of these ships; that report ought to be before the Senate. The Shipping Board, in selling these ships, apparently is disregarding its own rules and regulations to the extent, at least, that they have ordered the sale to take place to-morrow without referring it to the Merchant Fleet Corporation, as I am reliably informed has been done in the case of every other proposed sale, so that they might have the facts before them before the completion of the transaction. In this connection I will ask the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], who has had actual conversation with one of the members of the Shipping Board, to say whether or not I am correct about that matter.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I will answer his question immediately.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. STEIWER. I do not know whether I can unequivocally say that the Senator is correct, but I think I ought to state to the Senate the basis of the information upon which he is making his statement. The story was current this morning upon Capitol Hill that the Shipping Board was not following its customary practice in respect to the sale of these ships, in that it was not obtaining from the Merchant Fleet Corporation, through the technical men of that organization, an analysis and report concerning the wisdom and desirability of this very important sale. I attempted to telephone the chairman of the United States Shipping Board, but he was out at lunch. I then went to a committee meeting, and when I came back from my duties there I attempted again to telephone the chairman, but his office reported he was out. I then telephoned to another member of the board, and that member of the board told me that he had just finished a conversation with two of the technical men of the Merchant Fleet Corporation and that they had told him that no report had been made.

It seems to be—and I do not reflect on anybody in the statement I now make—that in face of this irregularity in procedure, no Senator ought to object to the unanimous-consent request made by the Senator from Tennessee. This transaction is so important, and there is so much involved, that at least we have a right to ask the Shipping Board to proceed in the customary and usual way; and, if it does not do so, we ought to require from them an explanation before the Commerce Committee.

In making this statement, Mr. President, I wish to remind the Members of this body that I am not one who has stood against the sale of the ships. I have believed in the sale of the ships to private owners. I voted last year when that important question was before the Senate for the sale of the ships to private owners; I am not an advocate of their retention by the Government, but I am an advocate of clean and prudent sales, and I think that the request of the Senator from Tennessee is a proper request.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Resolution 319.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, there is nothing in this resolution that charges any fraud or any wrong intention or anything of the kind. It recites in the preamble what might be termed general policies. The bids were opened practically a month ago, and no complaint has come to me at all, except some suggestions from bidders who were low bidders.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I am speaking of what has come to me.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the Senator knew of the resolution that was adopted by the Senate asking for information to be given as to these bids, and that certainly indicated a very strong determination upon the part of the Senate to know something about the transaction before the sale was consummated.

Mr. JONES. That resolution, I will say, indicated nothing to me; it merely asked for the facts; that is all. There has been no concealment of the facts in regard to these bids or anything of that kind.

Mr. President, it is, of course, an important proposition. These bids were opened, as I have said, practically a month ago. I do not know whether the Shipping Board proposes to sell these ships to-morrow or not, but apparently it is thought that they do, and that apparently is the only reason why we have been spurred to adopt such a resolution.

There is a great deal involved in this matter, in whichever way we may look at it. I will say that, in my judgment, the United States is never going to be offered so much money for these ships again. I have seen an outline, a mere skeleton, of the bids. One of the bids offered something like $16,000,000; the others offered about half that, or a little more. I do not know that the Shipping Board is going to act to-morrow; but I think we have a right to assume that they have looked into the standing and responsibility of the bidders. If they have not done so, they ought to do it, for they ought to know the bidders' responsibility.

However, Mr. President, I am satisfied from what I have heard and what I have seen that the Senate would like to adopt this resolution. What the committee will be able to learn I do not know. In my judgment, the Shipping Board and the agencies that it has are far better and far abler and far more competent to get at the facts than is any Senate committee. I have served on several Senate committees, and I know how they operate, so far as that is concerned. We are not practical, technical shipping men, and I myself do not pretend to be able to pass on the comparative bids that may be offered and that are offered; but I am not going to object to the consideration of the resolution. If the Senate desires to adopt it, well and good, and the committee will do the best that it possibly can; but I repeat that, in my judgment, if these bids are rejected we will never be offered that much money for these ships again.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Shipping Board is proceeding in accordance with the policy which has been laid down, why not let them manage it?

Mr. JONES. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. If we adopt this resolution, does the Senator from Washington think there will be any danger of losing this sale?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. That is along the line of a question that I should like to ask either the Senator from Washington or the Senator from Tennessee. The bid which has been referred to was submitted some time ago, was it not?

Mr. JONES. My recollection is that the bids were opened about the 10th of January.

Mr. NORRIS. That was before we passed the "big navy bill." Since we have provided for a bigger Navy, there will be much more commerce, vessels will be safer on the sea, and I should think that private bidders would pay more for them.

Mr. JONES. I have no doubt that the Senator from Nebraska really thinks that is so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I hope there will be no objection to my request.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator renew his request as soon as the vote has been taken on the pending question? Then I will not object. For the present, however, I do object.

Mr. McKELLAR. Can we not adopt the resolution now? Then we can have the vote on the item in the appropriation bill. No Senator is now going to object to the resolution, as I understand.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I think I should have to object.

Mr. WARREN. I object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming objects.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, may we have the pending question put?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Wyoming will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I object to the consideration of the resolution in the manner proposed by unanimous consent when the appropriation bill is under consideration and when a vote is about to be taken.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am perfectly willing to have a vote on the amendment to the Army appropriation bill if the Senator will not object to the resolution immediately afterwards.

Mr. WARREN. I do not care to trade. I do not want to place myself in the way of the Senator's desire; but, coming up at this hour, when we are about to vote on an amendment to an appropriation bill, I felt obliged to object.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator must understand that I had to ask for the adoption of the resolution or otherwise the sale would go through.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent to consider Senate Resolution 319 immediately after the vote on the pending question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, what is the request for unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee asked unanimous consent to have considered the resolution to which he has referred immediately after the vote on the pending question.

Mr. MOSES. The Vice President is as quick and as expeditious as is the President pro tempore. I said that I should feel moved to object, Mr. President, and I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire objects.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will renew it immediately anyway.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee. On that amendment the yeas and nays have been demanded and ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] to my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when Mr. PITTMAN's name was called). The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. He is paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. If the Senator from Nevada were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MOSES (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], but he has authorized me to say that if present he would have voted as I have voted, so I will let my vote stand.

Mr. FRAZIER. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. NYE] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. RANSDELL. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] on account of sickness.

Mr. NORRIS. My colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is unavoidably detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. JONES. I have been requested to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]; and

The Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 35, as follows:

PROPOSED SALE OF SHIPPING BOARD VESSELS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I now renew my request for the immediate consideration of Senate Resolution 319.

Mr. MOSES. And I still continue to object.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 319.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 319) to investigate the proposed sale of certain vessels operated by the Shipping Board and reconditioning of other vessels, which was read, as follows:

Whereas the United States Shipping Board has offered for sale to American citizens the steamships Leviathan, George Washington, America, Republic, President Harding, and President Roosevelt, now being operated as the United States Lines, and the steamships American Farmer, American Banker, American Shipper, American Merchant, and American Trader, now being operated as the American Merchant Line; and

Whereas the United States Shipping Board has, pursuant to its invitation, received several bids for said steamships and said services, and it is reported that the board is about to accept one of said bids and sell said steamships; and

Whereas the said services are now being maintained with said ships by the Shipping Board between the port of New York and ports of England, France, and Germany, and constitute the only American-flag passenger and mail and combination passenger, cargo, and mail services between the United States and the other three principal political and commercial nations of the world; and

Whereas the said services of the United States Lines and American Merchant Line, because of the countries to which they operate, the number and character of American citizens who travel to and from Europe and the United States for business, educational, pleasure, and other purposes, are rightly to be regarded as the premier and most essential of all American foreign-trade services; and

Whereas the maintenance of said services is, and the steamships now being operated and required to be operated in said services are, of a type and class most essential for national defense; and

Whereas for the reasons hereinbefore set forth it is of the highest public interest that said services and all or any of said steamships should be sold by the United States to American citizens only upon such terms and conditions as shall give assurance that said services can, under present authorizations of mail pay and under any reasonable forecast of business, be successfully maintained and developed and that the obligations required to be imposed upon the purchaser by the Shipping Board, under and pursuant to the conditions of its invitation for bids, can be carried out successfully by the party or parties to whom said ships and services are proposed by the board to be sold; and

Whereas one of said bids now before the Shipping Board provides for the construction of two giant steamships to cost approximately $28,000,000 each and another of said bids provides for the reconditioning of the steamships Mount Vernon and Monticello along the lines authorized by Congress under the act approved May 16, 1928, 75 per cent of the cost of which construction or reconditioning is to be advanced by the United States; and

Whereas any sale by the United States of said steamships and said services, and especially any sale embodying obligations to build new and costly ships, to the costs whereof the United States is to loan 75 per cent to be secured by first mortgages on such ships, leaving the private capital invested therein to be secured at best by subordinate mortgages, carries with it the implication (and almost the national guaranty) that such sale to private interests and the investment of such capial by its citizens is financially sound and the business enterprise resulting therefrom can be successful and the obligations undertaken can be met and performed; and

Whereas any financial disaster which might overtake an enterprise in the purchase and construction of the ships and the maintenance and operation of the services hereinbefore mentioned might not only involve American citizens in financial loss and entangle the United States with the citizens in the matter of marshaling the securities issued to the public by the owning or operating company or companies but would seriously jeopardize the future operation of these premier services and might well adversely affect national defense and the future of the American merchant marine by discrediting maritime securities with the American people, as well as in other direct and indirect ways; and

Whereas it is most essential to the public interest that the aforesaid steamships and services be sold only after the most careful and searching inquiry into the character and the experience in similar business enterprises and the financial responsibility of the bidders, the merits and business soundness of the proposals embodied in the respective bids, and of the undertaking required thereunder to be imposed upon and performed by the bidders, and the obligations and burdens to be imposed upon the United States morally, financially, and otherwise by and through the acceptance of any of said bids, to the end that the bid, if any, which shall be accepted shall be such as to give reasonable assurance of the continued successful maintenance and upbuilding of these principal American-trade and national-defense services; and

Whereas the ascertainment of the facts hereinbefore outlined can only be obtained and desirable wide public information in regard thereto can only be had through an investigation and public hearings by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be authorized and directed to investigate fully into each and all bids, and into all the phases and particulars thereof, now pending before the United States Shipping Board for the purchase and operation of the United States Lines and the steamships Leviathan, George Washington, America, Republic, President Harding, and President Roosevelt, and the American Merchant Line and the steamships American Farmer, American Banker, American Shipper, American Merchant, and American Trader, and/or for the construction and/or reconditioning of new ships or existing ships, and into forecasts of the commercial results reasonably to be expected from the operation of such ships.

That full authority is hereby vested in said committee to hold all hearings, whenever and wherever deemed necessary for said purposes, to require the production of records, documents, and other writings, to swear witnesses, and to take such other steps as may be found by said committee to be proper.

That pending further action by the Senate the United States Shipping Board is hereby requested to withhold making any sale of said steamships or said services, or to enter into contracts for the construction of new ships, or reconditioning of existing ships, for the use in such services.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That displaces the unfinished business.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, in order to replace it, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate may resume the consideration of the unfinished business, S. 1093, that it may be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate may then resume the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 33) to correct an error in the enrollment of the bill (S. 4338) relating to gold-medal awards.

CLAIMS UNDER WAR MINERALS ACT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1347) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1919, as amended, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That any claimant who has heretofore filed with the Secretary of the Interior within the time and manner provided by existing law a claim under said acts generally known as the war minerals acts (40 Stat. 1272, and its amendments) may within one year from the date of the passage and approval hereof petition the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to review the final decision of the Secretary of the Interior upon any question of law which has arisen or which may hereafter arise in the adjustment, liquidation, and payment of his claim under said acts, but the decision of the Secretary of the Interior on all questions of fact shall be conclusive and not subject to review by any court.

SEC. 2. In any proceeding brought under the provisions of section 1 of this act the Secretary of the Interior shall be designated as the defendant or respondent, and upon the filing of the petition the cause shall follow the usual procedure, subject to such rules or orders as the court may make with respect thereto.

SEC. 3. Jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, as a district court of the United States, to hear and determine all such suits and enter all orders, judgments, and decrees therein, subject to the usual right of appeal by either party to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, whose final judgment may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States by petition for certiorari or by appeal as provided by law and the rules of the court.

SEC. 4. Upon the final disposition of such proceeding the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall without delay certify to the Secretary of the Interior the final judgment or decree rendered therein, whereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall proceed with the final adjustment of said claim in accordance with the law as construed by the court in such judgment or decree.

Mr. ODDIE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, may we know what this bill is?

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, it is the bill that passed the Senate providing for the war minerals claims.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. How much does it carry?

Mr. ODDIE. We do not know. As the bill passed the Senate at the last session it provided that the claims go to the Court of Claims. The House has amended the bill by providing that they go to the District Supreme Court, with the right of appeal.

Mr. McKELLAR. In other words, there is no appropriation at all carried in this measure? It is merely an authorization to let the District court try the cases?

Mr. ODDIE. Yes; to decide on questions of law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada moves that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15712) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee passed over.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 81, line 14, where the committee proposes to strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$400,000," so as to read:

Flood control, Sacramento River, Calif.: For prosecuting work of flood control in accordance with the provisions of the flood control act approved March 1, 1917 (U. S. C. 1090, sec. 703), as modified by the flood control act approved May 15, 1928 (45 Stat. 534), $400,000.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I think this amendment will require a considerable amount of debate—the reduction of the next year's appropriation.

Mr. JOHNSON. They are both in the same category. Why not take it up and dispose of it now?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am perfectly willing to dispose of it by a viva voce vote.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, was it the ruling of the Chair that the unfinished business of the Senate has been displaced?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was displaced by taking up the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee; but, by unanimous consent, it has been restored to its place.

The question now is on the amendment of the committee on page 81, line 14.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there are several of these amendments that have been adopted. We got into the consideration of this matter so hastily that to-morrow, when the bill is proceeded with, I desire to ask unanimous consent that I may take up some of those that were adopted to-day and ask some questions about them.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. When the bill was taken up last Saturday I stated that I should agree to go back and join in the request that we go back to any amendment that any Senator wanted to reopen.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, inasmuch as we have disposed of the principal amendment, and the one immediately preceding it as to the amount to be expended being fixed by the Budget and being fixed by the report of the engineers, may I suggest that we take a viva voce vote upon the committee amendment, and dispose of it to-night?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am satisfied with that; and after that I shall expect to move a recess, because it will take at least an hour to dispose of the Scott Field amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, what is the amendment that we are asked to agree to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is similar to the one that has just been voted on.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is in the same category as the other; and a vote against the committee amendment is, like the other one, a vote "no."

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, may we have a statement from the Senator from Pennsylvania with regard to this amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 81, line 14, the committee proposes to strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$400,000."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, this amendment deals with the prospective work to be done on the Sacramento River. The Senate has just decided to make the retrospective refund to the State of California. The arguments against that question which was decided seem to me to be stronger than the arguments against the prospective appropriation of $1,000,000. It was cut down in the committee from $1,000,000, recommended by the Budget, to the amount which was given last year, $400,000; but I am frank to say that the appropriation of $1,000,000 as it comes from the House had the approval of the Budget, and of the House committee, and of the House in the passage of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. And the State has made the like appropriation.

Mr. OVERMAN. The same question is involved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

E. GELLERMAN

Mr. PHIPPS. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate bill 5514, for the relief of E. Gellerman, doing business under the name of the Lutz-Berg Motor Co., at Denver, Colo.; and I submit a report (No. 1656) thereon.

This is a small claim bill, involving less than $100; and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is authorized and directed to recognize as valid and binding the assignment by Walter G. Kuhn, formerly of Denver, Colo., and whose present whereabouts is unknown, to E. Gellerman, doing business under the name of the Lutz-Berg Motor Co., at Denver, Colo., of the former's claim against the United States, amounting to $94.65, arising out of an accident involving a United States mail truck, which occurred on November 29, 1927; the provisions of title 31, section 203, United States Code (sec. 3477 of the Revised Statutes of the United States), being expressly waived.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania has indicated his purpose to move a recess.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. At the close of the session yesterday there was a desire expressed by some to the leader upon the other side for an adjournment, in order that morning business might be attended to to-day. He said that for certain reasons, particularly with respect to the bill now under consideration, it was desirable that a recess be taken, but that an adjournment would be taken this evening. So the insistence upon the adjournment last night was not adhered to. Under those circumstances I inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania whether it would not be good faith to move an adjournment this evening.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not want to make any motion that would violate the agreement entered into by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. COUZENS. That was the agreement.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Then may I say to the Senate that I shall ask the Senate to continue on to-morrow evening, if this bill shall not be passed by this hour to-morrow. I think it is highly important that the bill be disposed of and gotten out of the way of the other bills that are crowding us.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, has the Senator agreed that we might have a morning hour to-morrow?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. In view of the agreement entered into with the Senator from Kansas I shall not make my motion for a recess, but will move that the Senate adjourn.

I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 7, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, February 6, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed, blessed be the name which is above every other name in heaven and in earth. In Him are united the ideals of sacrifice and service. He gives us the vision of mingled sorrow and love, of the human God and the divine man. Let it touch the finer senses of our beings, which are far above the sense of pleasure and more glorious than any gain. Save us, preserve us from the soil of sin, the clutch of selfishness, and the heat of passion. May these never be permitted to rob us of the fine graces and the noble virtues of Christian manhood. Bless us with the morning light. Send a ray from the eternal sunshine just for to-day. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 11526. An act to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 15386) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House, agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. McNARY, Mr. JONES, Mr. KEYES, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. HARRIS, and Mr. KENDRICK to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3848) entitled "An act creating the Mount Rushmore national memorial commission and defining its purposes and powers," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. FESS, Mr. GILLETT, and Mr. McKELLAR to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ELECTORS FOR PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication from the Secretary of State:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D. C.

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith in pursuance of the provision of the act of Congress approved May 29, 1928, an authenticated copy of the certificate of the final ascertainment of electors for President and Vice President appointed in the several States, excepting Mississippi and New Mexico, at the election held therein on the 6th day of November, 1928.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
For the Secretary of State:
TYLER DENNETT,
Chief Division of Publications.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me a moment?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is any reference of the communication of the Secretary of State necessary?

The SPEAKER. The certificates must be laid before the House and placed in the archives of the House a week before the vote is counted.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is not necessary to refer them to any committee.

The SPEAKER. No; they are simply placed in the archives of the House.

Mr. TILSON. And only the letter of the Secretary is read?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. It is not necessary to read the entire matter.

The SPEAKER. It appears in the Journal that these certificates have been transmitted by the Secretary of State and then they go in the archives of the House and that complies with the law.

The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PRINTING OF AMENDMENTS TO LAWS IN HOUSE REPORTS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have received a letter from Mr. George H. Carter, the Public Printer, that explains the practical workings of House Resolution 278, the resolution that was passed by the House a few days ago, making some changes in the printing in bills of amendments to various laws.

It seems to me that Mr. Carter has worked out a practical proposition, as he usually does, and I am going to ask the Clerk to read the letter from Mr. Carter in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1929.

Hon. BERTRAND H. SNELL,
Chairman Committee on Rules,
House of Representatives, United States,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SNELL: In regard to House Resolution 278, adopted on January 28, 1929, amending House Rule XIII with a new provision for the printing of House reports in which the repeal or amendment of existing law is proposed, I desire to submit the following suggestion for the uniform application of the new rule in the printing of House reports:

"Whenever a committee of the House reports a bill or joint resolution repealing or amending any statute or part thereof, the part to be amended or repealed shall be printed in the accompanying report in roman type within proper brackets and the proposed amendment shall be printed in italic type; except in cases where this procedure may not clearly indicate the proposed changes, in which event the printing of the statute and the changes proposed therein shall be in parallel columns."

The style above recommended has been used for years in the printing of Budget bills as considered by the House Committee on Appropriations and of amendments in all engrossed bills. In my opinion, line type (stricken-through letters) smaller than 14-point, the regular bill type, would be difficult to read. Furthermore, this office has not sufficient equipment at present to print House reports in line type (stricken-through letters) of the 8-point size now used in the printing of committee reports. It is not practical, either, to print always in parallel columns, except when unavoidable, as this form of composition materially slows up the work and would seriously delay the printing and delivery of the reports.

The inclosed slips indicate the method which this office proposes to adopt in complying with House Resolution 278, which I hope will meet with your approval. In the accompanying samples the words inclosed in brackets are to be omitted from the statute and those printed in italics are proposed for insertion in the statute.

It is important, of course, that the method adopted shall be uniform for all House committees, as a variation would not only be confusing to this office but would also greatly confuse Members in the consideration of committee reports printed in a variety of styles.

Respectfully yours,

GEORGE H. CARTER,
Public Printer.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have just presented this letter for the information of the House. It seems to me this will work out satisfactorily; at least, we will try it for the present.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a very short petition representing the views of 4,400,000 farmers on the question of a farm tariff. It is only four pages and I think it would be of interest to everyone.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, these petitions, as a rule, are placed in the basket and are noted in the RECORD. I think as far as any interest of any Member is concerned he could dig them out if he desired. They are of the type to which objection has been previously made, and I think in order to be consistent I shall have to object.

Mr. VESTAL. I think this is the first time in 12 years I have asked to have anything of this kind inserted in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

REREFERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a change of reference of the bill (S. 4517) appropriating tribal funds of Indians residing on the Klamath Reservation, Oreg., to pay expenses of the general council and business committee, and for other purposes.

This was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, probably due to the fact that it does make an appropriation. That committee would not have jurisdiction because it carries legislation supporting the use of the money. I have consulted the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. WOOD, the acting chairman of the Committee on Appropriations; the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. BYRNS, the ranking minority member; the gentleman from Montana, Mr. LEAVITT, chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs; and I ask unanimous consent for a rereference of this bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the bill (S. 4517) be rereferred from the Committee on Appropriations to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, do I understand the gentleman from Michigan that this was not properly referred to the Appropriations Committee and is a matter over which that committee has no jurisdiction?

Mr. CRAMTON. As the bill is drawn, no committee has jurisdiction of it. It carries a legislative matter that the Appropriations Committee could not report. The Indian Affairs Committee can make a bill out of it that is parliamentary, all right, if they will strike out the appropriation and put in an authorization. The Appropriations Committee could not make a bill out of it that would not be subject to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. On last Wednesday the bill H. R. 15092 had arrived at the stage where it was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time. The gentleman from Michigan demanded the reading of the engrossed copy. The Chair now lays before the House the engrossed copy.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15092) to authorize an appropriation to pay half the cost of a bridge near Soboba Indian Reservation, Calif.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the title should be amended. The committee recommended an amendment to the title.

The title was amended.

On motion of Mr. LEAVITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Indian Affairs.

THE OSAGE TRIBE OF INDIANS

The SPEAKER. On last Wednesday the House had started to consider S. 2360, and the time was in the control of the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 2360) to amend section 1 of the act of Congress of March 3, 1921 (41 Stat. L. 1249), entitled "An act to amend section 3 of the act of Congress of June 28, 1906," entitled "An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I think we have not arrived at that point. I think the debate is not finished. I had the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the committee amendments should be reported. The bill had been read the second time.

Mr. CRAMTON. I secured recognition last Wednesday and used a part of my time. It was understood at that time that I was to have an hour. I was about to yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma, and I would be glad to claim the balance of my time and yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, we are now in the House considering this bill. On last Calendar Wednesday the gentleman from Montana had used an hour and yielded the floor. The gentleman from Michigan claimed recognition, and, of course, will have an hour under which he can offer amendments if he chooses so to do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I will yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS]. Before the gentleman from Oklahoma begins his remarks I want to say that this is an important bill, and the gentleman from Oklahoma is very well versed in reference to it, and I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. Obviously, no quorum is present.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed, the Sergeant at Arms was directed to notify absent Members, the Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and forty Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

IMMIGRATION LEGISLATION

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until midnight to-night to file from the Committee on Immigration reports on the bill S. 5094, and two or three other bills, which have been ordered reported by the House committee, and that the minority may have until midnight to-morrow night to file minority views, if any.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that he may have until midnight to file reports on certain immigration bills, ordered reported by that committee, and that the minority may have until to-morrow night at 12 o'clock to file minority views, if any. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what are the bills?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. One might have been the bill of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, but that was passed unanimously by the committee. The other is a short deportation bill, the Box bill, regulating the coming in of aliens across he border, and the other is contract-labor provisions within the quota.

Mr. SABATH. And the Schneider bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And the Schneider bill.

Mr. SABATH. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

ALBERT C. READ AND OTHERS

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Concurrent Resolution 33, and agree to the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Concurrent Resolution 33, and consider the same. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 33

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (S. 4338) entitled "An act to authorize the President to award, in the name of Congress, gold medals of appropriate design to Albert C. Read, Elmer F. Stone, Walter Hinton, H. C. Rodd, J. L. Breese, and Eugene Rhodes," the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized to amend the title thereof so as to read: "An act to authorize the President to award, in the name of Congress, gold medals of appropriate design to John H. Towers, Albert C. Read, Elmer F. Stone, Walter Hinton, H. C. Rodd, J. L. Breese, and Eugene Rhodes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution merely corrects the title of the bill that was passed by the House. We added one name to the text of the bill and forgot to change the title of the bill, and this corrects that omission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is that all it does?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. It does not place any additional names on?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; it merely corrects the title.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. MCSWAIN, at the request of Mr. DOMINICK, on account of illness in family.

Mr. CHINDBLOM, until Monday, February 11, to attend the funeral of his father.

OSAGE TRIBE OF INDIANS

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, in the consideration of this legislation I think it would be helpful to make a brief statement with reference to the Osage Tribe of Indians.

This tribe in about 1870 purchased approximately 1,500,000 acres of land of the Cherokee Tribe of Indians and all this land is embraced in what is now Osage County, Okla. The tribe was induced to enter into an agreement on June 28, 1906, to have a roll made, as of date of July 1, 1907, and to allot the surface of their lands in severalty, reserving to the tribe the oil and gas and other minerals. The roll was made, which consisted of 2,229 members. All are now of age. Many of them are now dead, and my information is that there are about 1,540 of the originally enrolled allotted members still living.

The laws with reference to the Osages have been amended from time to time. The most notable amendatory act was approved on March 3, 1921, when the trust period was extended to April 7, 1946. As to most of the Indians, where they are under the supervision of the Government, we use the term "restricted." In the case of the Osage Tribe the Secretary of the Interior, when he finds that any member of this tribe may with safety be permitted to do business in his own behalf, issue to him a "certificate of competency," and therefore instead of using the term "restricted Indian," as applied to this tribe, the term "not having a certificate of competency" is used.

Nine hundred and thirty-eight of the 1,540 living members of the Osage Tribe have certificates of competency issued to them, leaving 602 originally enrolled members of different degrees of blood of this tribe restricted.

In addition, of course, there are a number of heirs or devisees to whom certificates of competency have not been issued and who are restricted and are therefore under the jurisdiction and supervision of the Secretary of the Interior.

The proposed amendment to the bill attempts, in section 1, to extend the trust period until April 8, 1958, and it continues the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior until January 1, 1959. I think the language is ambiguous and it should be clarified. In fact, section 1, as it is proposed to amend it, provides that the minerals shall be reserved to the members of the Osage Tribe until April 8, 1958, or until otherwise provided by act of Congress and as long thereafter as oil and gas or other minerals are found in paying quantities.

Of course, this continues the trust period indefinitely and without limitation as to date. In my judgment the date to which the trust period is extended and the date of the termination of the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior should be one and the same. I hope the committee will adopt an amendment to that effect.

Each of the 2,229 originally enrolled Osages had four allotment selections, the first of 160 acres, designated as his homestead. The other selections were 160 acres each, except the fourth, making an aggregate total of approximately 659 acres allotted to each member of the Osage Tribe. The last three selections, in so far as the surface of the land is concerned, are taxable, and the act of March 3, 1921, made the oil and gas subject to the gross production tax of the State of Oklahoma. Much of the surface has been sold and passed into white ownership.

This bill also has a provision making the laws apply equally to the enrolled and unenrolled members of the tribe, so that the Secretary of the Interior may issue certificates of competency to unenrolled members the same as to enrolled members of the tribe, and he has the same supervision over unenrolled members as over enrolled members.

Section 2 of the bill relates to a method of settling disputes for damages between the owners of land or lessees of the surface and those going on the land under oil and gas leases and drilling for oil and gas, and permits both parties to appeal from the decision of the Secretary of the Interior to the courts.

Section 3 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to pay any part or all of the funds held in trust for any Osage Indian not having a certificate of competency, in his discretion, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to the members of the Osage Tribe upon their application.

The bill also permits the Secretary of the Interior and the Osage tribal council to continue to make leases upon the land of the tribe, and reduces the acreage that may be leased in any one year to not less than 25,000 acres. The bill makes it clear that this does not affect valid existing leases for oil and gas or other minerals, but such leases are recognized and continued for as long as oil and gas are found in paying quantities. The bill provides for exempting homestead allotments from taxation.

I trust that the committee will accept an amendment confining this to restricted members of the tribe not having certificates of competency. This was the policy of Congress last year when the Five Civilized Tribes act was passed, and I see no reason why it should not be applied to the Osage Tribe.

It is urged that the Osages pay 1 per cent more as gross production tax on oil than the prescribed rate. This is true, but that provision was inserted in the act of March 3, 1921, in compensation for the extension of the trust period until April 7, 1946, and it will be noted that this additional 1 per cent gross production tax does not go to the State or the county but is to be used solely for building roads and bridges in Osage County, and the argument then urged was that it would enhance the value of the lands held by the Osages and also add to the value of the leases sold by the tribe.

Under the act of March 3, 1921, the adult enrolled members of the tribe were given $1,000 each per quarter out of his own funds and $500 per quarter for each minor child. As section 3 is written in the bill I think it ambiguous. In three places it refers to payments to be made to enrolled Indians of less than one-half blood. In lines 9 to 12, page 6, it requires the Secretary of the Interior within one year to—pay to each enrolled Indian of less than half Osage blood one-fifth of his or her proportionate share of accumulated funds:

After a period the language continues:

And such Secretary shall on or before the expiration of 10 years from the date of the approval of this act advance and pay over to such Osage Indian of less than one-half Osage Indian blood all of the balance appearing to his credit. * * *

In lines 15 to 19, page 7, it is provided—that the Secretary of the Interior shall on or before the end of five years from the date of the approval of this act pay to each restricted Osage Indian of less than half Osage blood who is not incompetent under the laws of the State of Oklahoma. * * *

I am not in sympathy with the efforts of this bill to make a debt-collecting agency of the Government of the United States. I believe in every Indian paying his debts, and believe that of every other citizen, regardless of his nationality.

Now, in this case the superintendent of the Osage Agency, acting for the Secretary of the Interior, is compelled to examine the accounts made by unrestricted Indians, free from governmental supervision, who are living in 23 States of the Union. One hundred and thirty-six of these Indians are of less than one-half Indian blood, and do not have certificates of competency. They have on deposit $5,600,000 to their combined credit, or an average of about $40,000 each. This money is placed to their individual credit. The lowest amount runs about $4,100 and the highest amount to the credit of any individual is $123,000. Many of these Indians live without the State of Oklahoma, and, as above stated, of the 938 to whom certificates of competency have been issued they are living in 23 States, as follows: 10 in Arkansas, 17 in Arizona, 85 in California, 24 in Colorado, 4 in Connecticut, 3 in Illinois, 120 in Kansas, 30 in Missouri, 596 in Oklahoma, 5 in Oregon, 27 in Texas, 2 each in Florida, Nebraska, New Mexico, and Utah, and 1 each in Iowa, Indiana, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Washington, and Wyoming.

In order to make a fair ascertainment of these debts a representative of the Osage Agency would have to go to each locality where these Indians live and go over all their books and make a personal investigation. These Indians are free of any governmental supervision. The Government never has, so far as I know, made a debt-collecting agency of itself. If we hold up the money due these unrestricted Indians, free of governmental supervision, and pay their debts voluntarily contracted, then in principle we should do this with every employee of the Government throughout the Nation. I believe every Government employee should pay his honest obligations, and it is the same principle. I believe every postmaster and rural mail carrier and other employee of the Government throughout the country should pay his honest obligations, but I do not believe that the Government should make a debt-collecting agency of itself and withhold money from those free of any governmental supervision.

I think there is a difference in principle between supervising the debts of restricted and unrestricted Indians. The one we are guardian for. We have supervision of his funds. The other has been and is free from all governmental supervision. I think this is a bad example to set, and I have taken this occasion to express my views upon it; and I trust that before the consideration of this bill is concluded that these objectionable features will be eliminated.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I will.

Mr. GARBER. Your expiration of restriction, of course, is conditional always upon the issuance of certificates of competency by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is true; and I have called attention to some amendments I think ought to be offered to this bill in order to clarify it. In section 1, page 2, this trust period is extended, according to the proposed amendments by the committee, until April 8, 1958, or until otherwise provided by Congress, which makes it indefinite; and then this other provision is continued:

> And as long thereafter as oil, or gas, or other minerals are found in paying quantities.

I am opposed to both provisions.

Mr. GARBER. May I inquire as to the necessity for such a long extension of the period?

Mr. HASTINGS. I am not finding fault so much with the time limit, but I am insisting that some definite time be carried in the bill. On page 3 there is a provision to exempt homestead allotments from taxation until the end of the trust period. We did not do that with other Indians——

Mr. GARBER. To the end of the proposed extension of the trust period?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is true.

Mr. GARBER. That would be unconscionable to the taxpayers of Oklahoma, would it not?

Mr. HASTINGS. I am protesting against the proposed exemption and asking that that provision be amended so as to make it only apply to restricted Indians, those to whom no competency certificate has been issued.

Mr. GARBER. As long as the restriction remains.

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; but I think it ought to be amended, as I have indicated. I would not have inserted it at all. Let us examine section 3 and to be absolutely brutally frank about it—section 3 is a debt-collection section and I am against the principle.

Mr. EDWARDS. Is the gentleman against the Indian paying his debts?

Mr. HASTINGS. No, sir; and I am not against the white man paying his debts or the gentleman from Georgia. I am not against any employee of the Government of the United States paying his debts. I am not against any postal employee paying his debts, I am not against any pensioner paying his debts. I try to pay my own debts, and I think everybody else should be encouraged to pay their debts. I am in favor of honesty in public life and private life, but I am opposed to the Government of the United States as to unrestricted Indians, as to those Indians over whom the Government has no supervision, being made a debt-collecting agency through a provision in this bill requiring that a certain amount of money shall be withheld from the funds of the unrestricted Osage Indians.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I will.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. What is the gentleman's position on the section to provide for paying the debts of the unrestricted?

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, I am discussing now the unrestricted Indians. I say it is wrong in principle to put that sort of a provision in the bill, and I hope such an amendment will be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. LEAVITT. I ask that the gentleman be given five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not want anyone to get the impression that I am not in favor of everyone, Indians and whites, paying their debts; but the people who sell to the Indians on a credit know the risk they run of losing those accounts. The people of whom I am speaking are residing in 23 States of the Union. This will necessitate the superintendent of the Osage Agency sending representatives to those various States, and it will involve an examination of books, and really make a debt-collecting agency out of the superintendent of the Osage Indians, and I am opposed to that provision. I am opposed to it on principle. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. As to an Indian to whom a certificate of competency has been issued, there does not seem to be any reason for the Government acting as a collecting agency against them. As to those to whom a certificate of competency has not been issued, the gentleman will permit me to read a section of the law, will he?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Section 6 of the law of 1925 provides that—

> No contract for debt hereafter made with a member of the Osage Tribe of Indians not having a certificate of competency shall have any validity unless approved by the Secretary of the Interior. In addition to the payment of funds heretofore authorized, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized in his discretion to pay, out of the funds of a member of the Osage Tribe not having a certificate of competency, any indebtedness heretofore or hereafter incurred by such member by reason of his unlawful acts of carelessness or negligence.

At the present time a contract can not be made without approval. As I understand, they are paying the debts of those with whom a contract has been made with approval.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to say, for the information of the gentleman from Michigan and my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD] that I am not so much concerned about the restricted Indian. A totally different principle is involved, in my opinion, between those over whom the Government retains supervision and guardianship and those who are turned loose. I think that most of the accounts that are examined and found meritorious are against Indians who are not free from governmental supervision. I have no objection to the Government paying those claims. But I do insist that it is a dangerous precedent to put into a bill a provision requiring the Government to withhold money and collect accounts from unrestricted Indians, who are just as free as any governmental employee throughout the country.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I do not care to argue this matter with the gentleman, but this section relates only to existing debts of Indians and does not apply to future obligations that may be incurred.

Mr. HASTINGS. The bill says "existing debts." But it applies to the unrestricted Indian the same as to the restricted, scattered over 23 States of the Union. It makes a debt-collecting agency of the Government of the United States as to the unrestricted Indian. It is wrong in principle, and so far as I am concerned I am opposed to it.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. This provision to which the gentleman refers applies to those who have more white blood in their veins than Indian blood. It does not apply to those of one-half Osage blood.

Mr. HASTINGS. It makes no difference. It applies to all.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have 15 minutes. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I think I am safe, in beginning the discussion of this bill, in saying that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] is not opposed to this bill so far as it has to do with the sections written into it at the express desire of the Osage Indians. Is that true?

Mr. HASTINGS. I would want to have some amendments added to the bill. I did not have full opportunity when I was on the floor to discuss each and every one of the amendments. I tried to point out the more important amendments that I desired to offer to the bill. There are others that I want to point out.

Mr. LEAVITT. I thank the gentleman. The point I make is that the gentleman from Oklahoma is interested in the welfare of the Indians of Oklahoma. He himself is of Indian blood to a very considerable extent. He is not opposing this bill as a whole. He is asking that there be included in it, as it goes to final passage, certain amendments that he has in mind. Those amendments, of course, will be considered by the House and free opportunity for discussion will be given.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. Certainly.

Mr. HUDSON. Could you strike out section 3 and still keep the larger integrity of the bill?

Mr. LEAVITT. I will make this statement: That the Osage Indians, through their council, are directly interested in two sections of this bill—section 1 and section 7. The other sections have been placed in the bill not at their request but in order to meet certain conditions that have arisen in regard to the handling of the Osage Indian property, in regard to lands that are under lease in the Osage country, and matters of that kind.

Section 6, which is written in the bill, is now there with the full intention of the committee itself to have that section stricken out, because its purpose would be to increase the quarterly payments required to these Indians. That was put in at the request of the Indians when their income was considerably greater than it is now. They prefer now to have the law remain as it is in that regard, so that section 6 can be considered, so far as the committee is concerned, as out of the bill.

Mr. HUDSON. Then the gentleman, if I understand him correctly, is saying that if section 3 and section 6 are stricken out the original integrity of the bill will be retained?

Mr. LEAVITT. The original intention, so far as the Osage Indian Council itself is concerned, will be taken care of under those provisions. This bill, as the gentleman from Michigan will recall, when he was a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, was brought before the committee and referred to a subcommittee on such matters, of which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SPROUL] was chairman. When considering the bill as it was brought to the committee by the Osage Council, certain other matters were written into it which, in the judgment of the subcommittee, should also be included in this kind of an Osage bill, and the bill is before the House in that form.

The purpose of this bill, so far as the Osage Indians are concerned, is to prevent what they believe and what I am sure the House believes would be a disaster to them should the law as it now exists go into effect and all restrictions on their lands expire on the 28th day of June, 1931.

If the law as it now exists remains unchanged, when the 28th day of June, 1931, comes, all restrictions on Osage Indian lands will be removed, because back in 1906 this Congress provided that the restrictions on their lands should expire on that date. In that event their property would be left entirely at their own disposal and subject to what has happened in the case of almost every Indian in this country from whom restrictions have been too soon removed. There would be a dissipation of his property and there would ultimately be left in certain communities large groups of Indians not able to handle their own affairs and subject, to a great extent, to the charity of those communities. So in order to avoid that these Indians themselves, through the representatives of their council, have come before the Committee on Indian Affairs and asked that those restrictions, so far as their homesteads are concerned, be extended for an additional period, and that they should remain restricted so long as these homesteads stay in the hands of those of half or more Indian blood.

I should correct my statement about that to some extent. The question of the quantum of Indian blood was written into the bill in the discussion in the committee and the consideration of the bill itself, but the purpose of the Osage Indians is to have these restrictions remain in force so long as we still have Indians of full blood or more than half blood not fully able to take care of their own property and who feel they are safer in the hands of the Government itself.

I should stop here long enough to say that there is at least a partial answer here to the question often raised here and there over the country on the part of people who do not understand the situation among the Indians, that all of these restrictions ought to be removed at once and that the Indian Bureau ought to be abolished. These Indians themselves came before our committee and asked to have this kind of restriction and this sort of supervision of their property continued until they feel their descendants are ready to take care of their own property, so that it will not be dissipated.

Section 7 has to do with the affairs of the Osage tribal council. They now have a tribal council and business committee and definite provision must be made for the future election of officers and the carrying on of their business to enable them to transact their own affairs as they have been doing in the past. That is the purpose of section 7.

The other sections besides 1 and 7 written in the bill were given long consideration but they are not so important to these Indians. There have grown up, however, certain conditions with regard to controversies between the owners of surface rights on some of these Osage Indian oil lands and the lessees for the development of the oil, and it has been concluded within the committee that full opportunity should be given, first, for agreement among those having these different interests, but, failing of agreement, that then they should have equal rights to go into the courts for a determination of what their rights are. For that reason there has been written in section 2. To section 2 there is an amendment which would strike out, as we are proposing ultimately to bring the bill to the House, from line 13 on page 4 of the Senate bill through to the end of the section and substitute for that the wording of an agreement that was reached between the representatives of these various interests. The Indians themselves stated before the committee that they were not greatly interested in that matter one way or the other, and they have no objection to it being in their bill. But it would appear to remove some difficulties that have grown up in the handling of those matters.

Then section 3, which is in controversy particularly and is opposed to a great extent by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], was inserted because of the judgment of the subcommittee. There has been much difference of opinion within the committee itself, but the majority of the committee voted to bring it before the House. I must agree that it does have to do with the collection of debts by the Government of the United States in connection with unrestricted Indians of less than half Indian blood. Many of these Osage Indians live in various parts of the country as well as in Oklahoma, and some have contracted very considerable debts. While they themselves are unrestricted, in many cases their funds are still subject to distribution to them by the Government because they have an interest in the income of these tribal oil lands. The situation is that the money in the hands of the Government can not be attached and secured for debts except under the honesty of these Indians themselves. The result is that there have been abuses.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. LEAVITT. The whole proposal there is, of course, that the debts of restricted Indians, over whom the Government has power at the present time more completely, if agreed to or approved in advance by the superintendent, can now be paid out of the restricted funds of those Indians, but that sort of thing can not be done in the case of these unrestricted Indians, who, in many cases, are of more white than of Indian blood. The question is whether the Government should have this right and obligation in connection with unrestricted Indians and make direct payment to people who have sold them the necessities of life with the expectation that the debts would be paid, but with resulting disappointment.

On the recommendation of the subcommittee, a majority of the committee finally agreed up to this point, that they would set a deadline and say that with regard only to necessities of life, not all kinds of debts—not the purchase of automobiles and things of that kind—but with regard to the actual necessities of life where the debt could be shown to be a just one and when it had been contracted prior to the enactment of this law, the Government would be authorized to hold out one-fourth of the income of these part-blood Indians and apply it on the payment of such debts.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman again yield there?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield.

Mr. HUDSON. Would not there always be a controversy arising as to what necessities were? What is a necessity to one may be a luxury to another and would there not always be that confusion and controversy?

Mr. LEAVITT. Of course, this is the sort of matter that has already been handled to some extent by the superintendent of the Osage Nation and the rules have been pretty strictly applied. I doubt that there would be any real conflict. There would be differences of opinion, but the decision would be made by the superintendent of the Osage Nation, and I have talked the matter over with him, and I am convinced that one would have to make an exceptionally good case in order to collect a cent under this provision of the law.

Mr. HUDSON. Right there, can not these people go to the superintendent and get this authorization now?

Mr. LEAVITT. Not for the Indians that are not under restrictions. The superintendent has nothing to do with these unrestricted Indians except that the Government does control part of their money and that it is therefore not subject to being attached by those to whom the debts are owed.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I would like for the gentleman to discuss how the superintendent could go out to California, or send an agent out there to examine the books of those living in California, or those living in Arkansas, or those living in Colorado, or those living in New Mexico. A number of them—and the exact number I will put in the RECORD—live in distant States, and how is he going to adjust these claims and make settlements without having some representative there to examine the books and go over them.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. May I answer that question?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The bill provides that the creditors who have claims for necessaries of life shall present them and prove them at Pawhuska to the Osage superintendent. He is not required to go anywhere. If the creditors do not see fit to satisfy him at Pawhuska of the merits of their bill, it will never be paid and no moneys will ever be retained.

Mr. HASTINGS. Suppose he finds it necessary in order to adjust the matter to find whether or not it is due, and all that sort of thing, that other books have to be examined other than the mere claim filed.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Is there such a provision in any other law regarding any other tribe of Indians?

Mr. LEAVITT. I think not.

Mr. HASTINGS. None whatever.

Mr. LEAVITT. This is brought in, as I have stated, as a result of the recommendation of the subcommittee and agreed to by the full committee. I am going to be frank with the House. The committee itself in its judgment is divided on this point.

What I want to impress on the House is this: There are two sections in this bill that are vitally necessary to the Osage Indians, and because of objection to some other sections the bill itself should not be delayed and should not be defeated. If in the wisdom of the House some of the sections are stricken out or if there are amendments written to the bill, we still this afternoon ought to pass this bill, that will give the protection to the Osage Indians that is necessary in accordance with experience in the handling of Indian affairs.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill, with the understanding that this does not prevent discussion of amendments under the 5-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the committee amendment has not yet been reported.

Mr. CRAMTON. And if I move to close debate, that will not prevent debate on the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The amendment has not yet been reported.

The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That section 1 of the act of Congress of March 3, 1921 (41 Stat. L. 1249), relating to the Osage Indians of Oklahoma, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a unanimous-consent request. The committee amendment is one amendment as a substitute for the text of the bill, but the committee amendment consists of several sections more or less unrelated. I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment may be divided and may be considered by sections and that any points of order against any section may be offered when that section is read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the committee amendment may be considered by sections. The Clerk will then read the first section of the committee amendment, when it will then be in order to debate it or offer points of order or offer amendments.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, a question for information. May we have the privilege of objecting to the unanimous-consent request?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. If so, at what time would it be in order to make the objection; now?

The SPEAKER. Now.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Then I make the objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. I ask for a division of the question. Perhaps that can only be done after the amendment is read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the first section should be reported first in its entirety.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all that part of the act of June 28, 1906 (34 Stat. L. 539), entitled "An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma, and for other purposes," which reserves to the Osage Tribe the oil, gas, coal, or other minerals, covered by the lands for the selection and division of which provision is made in that act is hereby amended so that the oil, gas, coal, or other minerals covered by said lands are reserved to the Osage Tribe until the 8th day of April, 1958, and as long thereafter as oil or gas or other minerals are found in paying quantities, and all royalties and bonuses arising therefrom shall belong to the Osage Tribe of Indians, and shall be disbursed to members of the Osage Tribe or their heirs or assigns as now provided by law, after reserving such amounts as are now or may hereafter be authorized by Congress for specific purposes, and the lands, moneys, and other properties now held in trust or under the supervision of the United States for the Osage Tribe of Indians, the members thereof, or their heirs and assigns, shall continue subject to such trust and supervision until January 1, 1959, unless otherwise provided by act of Congress. The Secretary of the Interior and the Osage tribal council are hereby authorized and directed to offer for lease for oil, gas, and other mining purposes any unleased portion of said land in such quantities and at such times as may be deemed for the best interest of the Osage Tribe of Indians: Provided, That not less than 25,000 acres shall be offered for lease for oil and gas mining purposes during any one year: Provided further, That as to all lands hereafter leased, the regulations governing same and the leases issued thereon shall contain appropriate provisions for the conservation of the natural gas for its economic use, to the end that the highest percentage of ultimate recovery of both oil and gas may be secured: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting any valid existing lease for oil or gas or other minerals.

Homestead allotments shall remain exempt from taxation while the title remains in the allottee or in his unallotted heirs or devisees of one-half degree or more of Osage Indian blood until January 1, 1959: Provided, That the tax-exempt land of any such Indian allottee, heir, or devisee shall not at any time exceed 160 acres.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the committee amendment may be read by sections. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 22, after the figures "1958," insert "unless otherwise provided by act of Congress."

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment, which is offered at the request of the Osage Indians and brought to me as chairman of the committee, is to remove doubt to some extent as to the expiration or extension by Congress of the restricted period.

Mr. CRAMTON. Congress can do that anyway, can it not?

Mr. LEAVITT. That is my judgment, but the Indians want this in.

Mr. CRAMTON. Congress has extended the period from time to time.

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The necessity for this amendment is brought about by the Indians having sold their rights to other purchasers, who are claiming that at the expiration of the fixed date they come into ownership of the oil, gas, and other minerals under the surface. This makes it certain that Congress continues control over the extension of the tribal rights.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I want to be heard, as I am opposed to the amendment. I want the attention of the committee. This amendment ought not to be inserted. Oil, gas, and other minerals were reserved in the original Osage allotment act until April 8, 1931. By the act of March 3, 1921, we extended this trust period until 1946. Now this bill extends it until April 8, 1958, but if you insert this amendment you might as well cut out the year 1958, for it does not mean anything.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. The committee amendment reads—

and as long thereafter as oil or gas or other minerals are found in paying quantities.

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; and I shall move to strike out that language. It makes it indefinite. Such language never has been put in any bill before. Let me warn the House that if you let that language go in the representatives of the Osage Indians for the next 100 years will be making claims to Congress.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Why?

Mr. HASTINGS. Because you leave it indefinite. I know that in the first place the original allotment act provided to terminate trust period, April 8, 1931. The act of March 3, 1921, extended the trust period to April 7, 1946. This extends it until April, 1958, with indefinite language in there—"as long as oil and gas and other minerals are found in paying quantities." That renders it meaningless.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Is it contended that if this language is left out it will make it a closed proposition?

Mr. HASTINGS. No; because Congress at any time prior to 1958 can extend it as it did on March 3, 1921, when it extended it to 1946. If you put this language in, a hundred years from now the Osage Indians will be coming to Congress and saying that you must make good their claim, and I think this language is dangerous and unnecessary.

Mr. LEAVITT. What is the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. HASTINGS. To make this just as you did by the act of March 3, 1921—extend it until 1958. If you want to extend it further to January 1, 1959, I have no objection. I want to strike out the language—and as long thereafter as oil or gas or other minerals are found in paying quantities.

If you refer to section 1, the act of March 3, 1921, you will see that that language is not in it. It extends it until April 7, 1946.

Mr. LEAVITT. The judgment of the gentleman is that the Indians are just as well or better protected without that language?

Mr. HASTINGS. Exactly; and the Government is protected. I think it is my duty in looking after the Indians of the country to point out what is going to happen. Some claim is going to be made against the Government as sure as you put this language in.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the gentleman did not present all of these views while the committee was considering this legislation in the subcommittee for a long time and before the general committee. We have been very slow in bringing out this bill in the hope that it would ripen into its proper form.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman had not offered this amendment before. It is not in the committee print.

Mr. LEAVITT. This is not a committee amendment. It is offered by me at the request of the Osage representatives who brought it to me and asked that I present it to the House.

Mr. HASTINGS. I say that if that amendment is adopted, then you have no time limit fixed in this bill at all, and it is entirely indefinite, as it runs not only until 1958, but for a thousand years, and I want to warn the House so that it votes on this amendment with its eyes open.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Suppose that the Government, on behalf of the Indians, in making title to the surface of the land by patent deeds provided in the patent deed that they have a title to the surface subject to the right of the Government on behalf of the Indians in the mineral rights which were extended to a certain date.

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, well, that question is not involved here at all. This is the question of the extension of the trust period and the original allotment act of June 28, 1906, extended the trust period until April 8, 1931. The act of March 3, 1921, extended the trust period until April 7, 1946. What I want to do is to continue this trust period to a definite date and not leave it indefinite, as the amendment of the gentleman from Montana or the committee amendment will do.

Mr. LEAVITT. Let me correct the gentleman there. This is not the personal amendment of the gentleman from Montana or of the committee, but it is offered by me from the Osage Tribe of Indians.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am trying to warn the House. As a Member of the House there is some responsibility upon me as well as upon others. I say to the House now just exactly what that kind of an amendment means. I say that the Indians are protected if you put in a definite date. If the gentleman thinks a longer date than 1958 ought to be inserted, I will vote with him, but I think the Government ought to be protected, and I think there should be a definite date.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It does not seem to me that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Montana would make one particle of difference one way or the other, because Congress has the right to legislate and extend it before the period of expiration.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then why not cut out 1958 and quit camouflaging about it.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I do not think the amendment means a thing, whether it stays in or stays out.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then if it does not, and if there is danger, why not vote it down?

Mr. LEAVITT. Has the gentleman any further statement to make?

Mr. HASTINGS. No.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Referring to the provision on page 3:

Provided, That not less than 25,000 acres shall be offered for lease for oil and gas mining purposes during any one year.

Mr. HASTINGS. The proposed amendment is on page 2, line 22.

Mr. FREAR. I am asking in addition to that for this information. Can the gentleman give me that?

Mr. HASTINGS. I think I can.

Mr. FREAR. It provides that not less than 25,000 acres shall be offered for lease for oil and gas mining purposes during any one year.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am in favor of that.

Mr. FREAR. Why?

Mr. HASTINGS. The present law necessitates the Government offering 100,000 acres a year. Sometimes there is a disturbance in the oil situation out there. The price of oil goes down because there is an oversupply. It is thought not desirable, not in the best interests of the Indians, to compel the leasing of such a large acreage, and this permits some elasticity, so that it can be run down to not less than 25,000 acres which may be offered for lease.

Mr. FREAR. Why as much as 25,000 acres?

Mr. HASTINGS. So that some development may go on.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The committee was asked by the oil conservation board to remove any minimum amount that could be leased each year by the Secretary of the Interior, but we saw fit to require at least 25,000 acres to be leased.

Mr. FREAR. That is the question: Whether or not 25,000 acres is the right amount for each year. Why have an amount as large as that?

Mr. HASTINGS. It is quite safe now to put in that amount. We required 100,000 acres when the trust period had not been extended and we inferred the country would not be developed unless we required a large amount. Now, since the trust period is being extended, it is safe to offer a less acreage.

Mr. FREAR. But why 25,000 acres?

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, that was a compromise.

Mr. FREAR. It might be 100,000 every year.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. They can lease whatever they see fit not less than 25,000.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I speak with a good deal of diffidence on this bill, because the Osage situation is so complicated, but I thought I might direct attention to this proposition and in reference to the amendment which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] intends to offer. I can not see that the Leavitt amendment makes any difference whether it is in or whether it is out, and I do think that it is very desirable that the Hastings amendment be not adopted. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] is correct that if the bill passes as proposed by the committee, the gentleman from Montana, we have an indefinite period. But to my mind the circumstances are such that an indefinite period is necessary. As I understand, the Osage Tribe of Indians own land and the mineral rights under the land. The mineral rights are reserved to the tribe as a whole to-day, owned by the tribe as a whole, but the land was allotted. Now, there might be valuable oil still in this piece of land allotted to A and no oil in this land allotted to B. Now, these lands are sold and disposed of and pass from hand to hand more or less, but the oil belongs to the tribe. It is not sold; but we are here providing for its preservation to the tribe until 1958; but when 1958 comes suppose Congress did not take any further action, did not extend the period further. Suppose the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma was adopted and leases that are then in operation are still producing. What are we going to do with the oil that is thereafter developed under the remaining wells? Why, it goes to the owner of the land, and as I understand the situation the oil should not go to the owner of the surface as long as it is producing to a valuable extent. It seems to me it is going to be desirable to retain the oil produced as a tribal asset for every member of the tribe, whether restricted or unrestricted, or whatever may be the status, to continue to draw down a proportionate share. Now, the equity appears when you remember that the oil field is developed at the expense of the tribe and not of any individual. I do not see any reason in 1958 or in 1950 any more than in 1960 that the oil under the land should come to the owner of the land. I think the oil should continue to go to the tribe and be administered as an asset of the tribe, in which he has a share. Therefore I do not see that the amendment of the gentleman from Montana matters, as I understand Congress will have the right to do it anyway, but I feel it is undesirable to adopt the amendment the gentleman from Oklahoma proposes to offer.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The gentleman has not offered his amendment.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am going to ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more because——

Mr. LEAVITT. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to answer the gentleman from Michigan, and I want to talk on both amendments at one and the same time.

Mr. LEAVITT. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEAVITT. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes in regard to his amendment. Now, in what position would I be if I do not object to that, in regard to the amendment now pending?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would take the gentleman off his feet.

Mr. LEAVITT. I do not want to do that.

The SPEAKER. Under the present parliamentary situation we are in a rather peculiar position because we are operating in the House, this being a House bill, and we are operating under the hour rule.

Now the gentleman from Michigan asked and procured unanimous consent to consider the Senate amendment, separately, by sections. Therefore, any gentleman obtaining the floor is entitled to an hour. If that gentleman yields the floor and another gentleman gets the floor, he is entitled to hold it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Would it be in order to secure unanimous consent to consider these committee amendments and amendments thereto under the 5-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent to do that.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then I ask unanimous consent to do that, Mr. Speaker, and ask that the gentleman will yield to me for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to consider this committee amendment and amendments thereto under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is it the understanding that this full committee amendment shall be read by sections?

The SPEAKER. That is already ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). The gentleman from Kansas moves to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I disagree with the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] as to the law relating to the tribal-owned mineral rights under the surface of their original tribal land. If there were no property rights except the Indian tribal rights, then a definite date for the extension of tribal rights in the mineral could be fixed. But there are other interests. The oil-lease holders and the landholders have received leases and deeds to exist so long as the tribal title is provided by law—1946. If the law does not provide that Congress shall have power to further extend the life of ownership of the tribe in the mineral under the land, then the rights and title of the surface owner would become absolute and entire in the fee title. Hence the great importance of a provision to extend the title to a date certain and as much longer as may be provided by Congress, even indefinitely; but the provision in the bill suggested by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] continues the tribal deed to the surface only as long as the Government wishes to continue it, and if such a provision of the law is put in the deed or patent, then the purchaser does not buy without notice. He buys with nctice, and the Indians continue to use the oil and the gas under the land. That is the purpose of this amendment. That is why the Osages and their attorneys insist on its being put in, because many of the owners of the surface of the land are looking forward to the time when they will have opportunity to demand control of the oil rights.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I do not see how they can convey anything but the surface rights of this land under the bill, so that whoever took the land would get only the surface rights, and Congress can legislate with respect to that, notwithstanding this amendment as proposed.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Well, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] has suggested, it can do no harm to put it in there. We have not sufficient time to discuss the law bearing on it. The owners of the surface are looking to the time when they shall obtain control, and their lawyers advise them that when that does happen they can demand the oil under the land. But otherwise the oil and gas are continued, and if the oil rights are continued they will never get title to the oil under the land.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does not the gentleman understand that this will not affect the deed?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. If the gentleman will examine the deeds he will see that there is a provision in them for this very contingency. That is why I am urging it.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. I am particularly interested in the discussion between the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD] and the gentleman from Kansas with reference to the change from the requirement of leasing 100,000 acres down to 25,000 acres. What effect, if any, will this amendment have on the leasing requirement and the bringing in of additional oil wells if this amendment is adopted?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. At the present time the price of oil is extremely low. There is enough money for the maintenance of the Indians. If you increase the amount to greater than 25,000 acres, you will be wasting the oil on a low market. Many of the sections of land adjoining the land operated require offset wells to be drilled, and you have to make leases for such purposes to protect the unleased land from drainage.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. It is provided that not less than 25,000 acres shall be offered in any one year. That is 40 square miles every year. It does not say "not more" but "not less."

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I am taking the floor as much to get my own mind cleared up as for the purpose of giving information to the House.

Under this bill, as I understand it and certainly under the act of June 28, 1906, all the oil and minerals under the surface of these Osage Indian lands are reserved to the Osage Indians as a tribe. That is the law now. Now, grants can not be made without, in effect, incorporating the statute in the deeds of conveyance, and no grantees can receive more than the act of 1906 gives them, and such act specifically reserves all oil, gas, coal, and other minerals to the Osage Tribe, and hence grantees acquire no right whatever to the minerals under the surface of the ground.

Now, the sponsors of this bill propose to extend the provisions of that act until April 8, 1958, and, in my judgment, such extension carries with it all the conditions of the act of 1906. It follows that any conveyance made up to 1958 would only convey the surface rights and not the minerals underneath the ground. Nor will such conveyance transfer any possible contingent right to the minerals after 1958. Hence no vested right to such oil or minerals can accrue to grantees of lands within the purview of this bill or the act of June 28, 1906. Congress, therefore, would be clearly within its rights if, prior to 1958, it should provide for a further extension of the 1906 act.

So, whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] is in the bill or whether it is out of the bill makes no particular difference, in my judgment. No vested rights are involved, because the Government has specifically reserved the mineral rights. The situation is in no wise different, as I view it, than that created by the ordinary patent for land where mineral rights are reserved. All patents now issued for public lands open to homestead entry have a reservation by which the Government expressly reserves the minerals, so that all conveyances made in the future must necessarily have written into them such a reservation for the purpose of construction. Successive transfers can add nothing to the original grant. Such conveyances necessarily embody the language of the law, which reserves the minerals, whether such language is written into them or not. That is exactly what you will have here if you pass this bill without the amendment.

I can see no harm in putting it in, but I do not think the amendment would change the law one particle, because any conveyance for the land effected by this bill would only transfer the rights of the grantor. Not having any right to the oils or minerals that might lie below the surface, he could grant none. The grantee must necessarily take notice of the law limiting the character of the grant under the act of June 28, 1906. I should like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] if he concurs in this view.

Mr. HASTINGS. I would like to claim the floor in order to answer the question asked by the gentleman from South Dakota and also the question raised by the gentleman from Michigan, and if the gentleman will yield to me now I will do so.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HASTINGS. Here is the proposition. The lands of the Osage Tribe were allotted under the allotment act of June 28, 1906, and title was passed. The right to the minerals was reserved in that act until April 8, 1931, and deeds were issued. Prior to April 8, 1931, namely, on March 3, 1921, Congress extended the trust period until April 7, 1946, without any conditions. Now, this is prior to April 7, 1946, namely, 1929, and now Congress, by this provision, gives a further extension. The point I am trying to make is that we ought to extend it to a certain definite date, because prior to 1958 the hands of Congress ought not to be tied. If Congress, prior to 1958, thinks it wise, it can make any change or extension that may be desirable, and its hands ought not to be tied in the meantime, and no hope ought to be held out to anyone upon which he can base a claim to be reimbursed. While I have objection to this amendment I have really more serious objection to other language reported in other parts of the bill——

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Without going into that discussion let me ask the gentleman this question: Whether in his judgment conveyances made between June 28, 1906, and up until this time conveyed anything at all but the surface rights?

Mr. HASTINGS. None whatever, in my judgment, and prior to 1946, in my judgment, and prior to 1958, in my judgment, it would convey no more rights. The gentleman and myself agree on that and we are not in disagreement about it, but I think whenever you are extending the trust period in a bill you ought to put in a definite certain date and not a conditional time.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I do not yield further. I think it is clear, gentlemen, that whether the proposed amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] is in the bill or out of it does not make any difference whatever because in no event will the deeds of conveyances convey anything but the surface rights, the mineral rights having already been reserved.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words. If you will examine the language in this bill you will find it follows exactly the language of the act of March 3, 1921, except that it adds a condition. We extended this period once, namely, by the act of March 3, 1921, until April 7, 1946. If we were to extend this until April 8, 1958, it would be exactly like our 1921 statute, but the committee inserts in the bill certain words as follows:

> And as long thereafter as oil, or gas, or other minerals are found in paying quantities,

Which really renders that meaningless, does it not? Of what use is the date of 1958 when the bill adds the words:

> And as long thereafter as oil, or gas, or other minerals are found in paying quantities,

If that means anything, it means that this would continue for 1,000 years after every original allotted Osage is dead, provided oil or gas or other minerals are found in paying quantities during that time.

Now, I want to answer the gentleman from Michigan. The Osages made an allotment agreement June 28, 1906, in which the mineral rights were reserved until a certain time; namely, April 8, 1931. Prior to that time the period was extended until 1946 and now another extension is proposed. I supported the extension in 1921 and I do not oppose this extension. I will favor any reasonable extension that the gentleman from Montana or his committee will offer. If the gentleman thinks 1958 is not long enough, I will vote for another date, but what I am trying to press upon the House is that we should not be deceived by this language. I think you ought to fix a definite date in the bill, because whenever we put in the bill until April 8, 1958—

> And as long thereafter as oil, or gas, or other minerals are found in paying quantities,

We do not mean that this period is extended to 1958, but it might mean for 1,000 years if they continue to find oil and gas or other minerals there. I contend that Congress, prior to 1958, ought not to have its hands tied, because as 1958 approaches Congress will know the situation, and if it is necessary the time can be further extended, and if that is desirable I feel sure Congress would do it.

But I do not believe we ought to put language that makes it indefinite in a bill. I think it is dangerous; I do not think it is desirable; I do not think it is wise; I do not think that Congress ought to tie its own hands.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I do not believe that language makes very much difference, because, after all——

Mr. HASTINGS. Then why not strike it out?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I do not know that I would want to strike it out. It is only in case of a grant by the Government that any vested rights could accrue. This refers to a grant withholding the minerals from any person who may acquire a title to the land.

Mr. HASTINGS. I deeply regret that I have been unable to impress my thought upon the gentleman from South Dakota. I know the fault is with me. When 1958 shall come, there may be only a handful of these Indians living. Perhaps in the meantime Congress will have continued the period again, but about a hundred years from now you will have representatives of these deceased Indians coming here and pointing to this act, and they will say, "No; we reserved these minerals not until 1931, because you extended it to 1946; not until 1946, because you continued it until 1958"; and then they will say, "No; not until 1958, because you continued it in a solemn act of Congress as long as oil and gas and other minerals are found in paying quantities"; and if in the next 50 years, or after 1958, there is some oil and gas found in paying quantities, they will have a just and valid claim against this Government; and while those here will not be bothered with it, some future Congress will; and knowing the situation as I do, I feel that there is some responsibility upon me, at least to point out to the Members of this House this fact and let them vote with their eyes open.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word and ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. LEAVITT. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein a few brief statements on Indian affairs clipped from a magazine.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is that the article on Indian affairs in Good Housekeeping?

Mr. GREEN. It is.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say to the gentleman of my own personal knowledge that that article does a gross injustice to your Government and to mine, and I object to any such extension of remarks.

Mr. GREEN. I would like to say before the gentleman makes his objection that a Member of Congress has told me that it is absolutely true.

Mr. CRAMTON. It can not be absolutely true.

Mr. HASTINGS. It is already in the RECORD.

Mr. CRAMTON. I object.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made to the extension of remarks.

Mr. GREEN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FREAR. Anything I have said or anything I have quoted I will say is absolutely true and witnesses can be presented, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. HASTINGS. The matter referred to is already in the RECORD. It was put in over in the Senate.

Mr. GREEN. This particular article?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; it was inserted in the Senate.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. It is published in the RECORD of January 26, under remarks of Hon. W. B. PINE, of Oklahoma, and it would be improper, of course, to include under another extension of remarks the same matter that has already been placed in the RECORD.

Mr. GREEN. I am glad to receive the information that the article is in the RECORD. That is all I wanted. I wanted the article in the RECORD in order that my colleagues may have the benefit of reading a report which is as startling as this report is. Will the gentleman give me the page number?

Mr. LEAVITT. It is in the RECORD of January 26.

Mr. GREEN. Give the page, please.

Mr. LEAVITT. It is on page 2258 of the RECORD of January 26.

Mr. GREEN. I would like to ask my colleagues to take enough time to read that article. You will not read anything during the next six months which will be as great a revelation to you as that article was to me. It shows the fact that the Indian population of our Nation has decreased 62 per cent in a very few years and tells of the gross injustice to and neglect of this proud race of our Americans by the Bureau of Indian Affairs and other constituted agencies of our Government. It tells of their maladministration and tells of the terrifying conditions of starvation, punishment, neglect, curable illness, as well as crime in the Indian Government schools. Frankly, my colleagues, it is horrifying, and a Member of the Congress has told me that these statements——

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Not right now. I will yield to the gentleman if I am given more time.

It is alleged in this article——

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I am discussing these Indian bills now before the House, and in order to discuss the amendment I must bring out essential facts relative to the mistreatment of Indian children, Indian adults, and the malfeasance, nonfeasance, and misfeasance of the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule on Calendar Wednesday is that gentlemen must confine their remarks to the subject matter under consideration. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. GREEN. I maintain to my colleagues that if Indian children are being hooked to plows and if fields thus tilled with 12-year-old Indian boys instead of beasts of burden, surely that is in order. The article goes on to state that they are even poked and beaten with sticks when they are tired and lag behind in the plow harness, and that they are beaten in the faces and mouths and made to work in balls and chains, dragging iron balls, these school children.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I renew the point of order. I do not do this in order to keep the matter out of the RECORD——

Mr. GREEN. If they are given food in the Government schools which has maggot worms in it and mice in it, as this article describes, if the doctors are refusing to attend Indian women when they cry out for them in time of need, and if Indian school girls are disciplined by being forced to kneel on hard floors all night and given only bread and water. The article says they are given weak, poor food and not nearly enough of it and are, in fact, in many cases starved to death——

Mr. LEAVITT. Does the gentleman know that is true?

Mr. GREEN. If they are not given proper food, but are given bread and water instead—tell me these things are not material? They are being starved and beaten and worked in balls and chains and denied medical attendance. Twenty per cent have trachoma and tuberculosis. Is——

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield, they would be material if true; but they are not true.

Mr. GREEN. All I can say to my friend from Michigan is that a Member of Congress who has traveled 45,000 miles at his own expense, and whose veracity I refuse to question, has told me to-day that these conditions as mentioned in this statement are not only true but more than that is true.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida asks that his time be extended five additional minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LEAVITT. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Florida intend to discuss the amendment? If the gentleman is interested in the Indians instead of talking about something that somebody told him or what he has read in some magazine, he should talk about the amendment and help to pass the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. But not to include the matter which has been objected to.

Mr. GREEN. No, Mr. Speaker, the article is in the RECORD where the gentleman from Michigan can read it. Possibly, then, he and others here to-day will have their eyes opened and cooperate in correcting these abuses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment close in five minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to say to the gentleman from Florida that the "gentleman from Michigan" read as far in the article as he could stand it, but encountered so much misstatement and villification of the Government that in disgust he laid it aside.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement for just one minute. I wish to say that the gentleman approached me a while ago. I have said repeatedly that I have made these statements on the floor of the House, and any statement I made I am prepared to support by evidence. When this woman asked me if she was subject to libel if she printed these matters, I said, "Not for any statement that I have made on the floor of the House," because they are true, in my judgment. [Applause.]

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I will withhold my request for unanimous consent long enough to say that I am not asking to expedite the bill in order to stop the discussion of these other matters; but we have before us a bill which the Osage Indians desire very much to have passed to-day for their protection. Discussion of other matters is taking up the time of the House, and I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be closed in five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment be closed in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GREEN. Reserving the right to object—and I will not object—as I understand, the gentleman would not object to speeches along this line later on?

Mr. LEAVITT. This is Calendar Wednesday and we have before us 12 bills in which various tribes of Indians are interested.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

Mr. FREAR. This does not interfere with amendments to follow in sections?

Mr. LEAVITT. No.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. KETCHAM. May we have the amendment reported again?

The amendment was again reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HASTINGS), there were 49 ayes and 9 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HASTINGS to the committee amendment: Page 2, line 22, after the figures "1958" strike out the following: "and as long thereafter as oil, gas, or other minerals are found in paying quantities."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take up the time of the House much further. This extends the trust period until 1958. As I stated a moment ago, the trust period did run until 1931. By act of March 3 we extended it to 1946, and this extends it to 1958, but with the language that follows it is indefinite. With this amendment added to the language that I move to strike out it renders it meaningless and indefinite.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. The committee put those words in thinking to safeguard the interest of the Indians. Personally, I have no objection, and I do not think anybody else has, to the elimination of those words. I am speaking, though, for myself alone.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am a sincere friend of the Indians and also of the Government, and I think we should have definite language in the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRAMTON) there were 36 ayes and 21 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendments, which I send to the desk, which are textual in nature.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 3, line 3, strike out the words "and the," insert a period, and begin a new paragraph with the word "The."

Page 3, line 4, after the word "now," insert the words "or hereafter."

Page 3, line 8, begin a new paragraph with the words "The Secretary."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON to the committee amendment: Page 3, line 25, strike out the words "allottee or" and insert "original allottee of one-half degree or more of Indian blood and."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, in explanation of that, this is a question of the taxation of the restricted homesteads of these Indians, and the amendment makes it clear that such exemption is only granted in favor of the original allottee or his heirs or devisees, and in each case the allottee or heir, in order to have the benefit of the exemption, must have at least one-half degree of Indian blood. The amendment states "Indian blood" instead of "Osage Indian blood."

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I notice the gentleman uses the expression "one-half degree of Indian blood." It should be "one-half Indian blood."

Mr. CRAMTON. I have merely followed the committee language.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Does not the committee strike out the word "degree"?

Mr. CRAMTON. On page 4 of the bill it uses the word "degree."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. What about this amendment to the gentleman's amendment on page 3, line 24, after the word "allotment," to insert—of Osage Indians not having a certificate of competency.

That would extend the exemption from taxation to the homesteads of the restricted Indians, those not having a certificate of competency. So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to exempting land from taxes of unrestricted Indians. Whether the gentleman accepts this amendment or not, I want to offer it later.

Mr. CRAMTON. That matter is a separate proposition, and could be offered separately.

Mr. HASTINGS. Very well. Let us have the gentleman's amendment again read.

Mr. CRAMTON. Unless they are of at least half Indian blood they would not get the benefit of this tax exemption.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am in favor of that.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I do not quite understand the gentleman's amendment. Does the gentleman mean that the Indian blood must be of Osage Indian blood?

Mr. CRAMTON. No; just Indian blood.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I think the word "Osage" should go in there, because Indians of other tribes are marrying these Osages to some extent, and there is no reason why we should exempt a homestead to them.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not insisting upon that. That suggestion was made, and it appealed to me to have weight; but if the gentlemen from Oklahoma are averse to it, I shall ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment in that respect.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The original bill was "Osage Indian blood."

Mr. CRAMTON. I shall ask to put in the word "Osage" before the word "Indian."

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I thought the committee had stricken out the word "degree" in every case where it was used.

Mr. LEAVITT. No.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I think the language is incorrect. "One-half degree Indian blood" does not mean anything. It should say one-half. A degree may be a sixty-fifth.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, the committee took no final action on that. So much of the legislation uses "one-half degree," and so on, that I do not think there is any possibility of misunderstanding.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Is that the common language used throughout these bills?

Mr. LEAVITT. That is my understanding. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTWRIGHT] states that that is the language used in the legislation for the Five Civilized Tribes. There is no objection to striking out the word "degree."

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in every place where the language "one-half degree of Indian blood" appears in the bill that it be made to read "one-half Osage Indian blood."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan withdraw his request to modify his amendment?

Mr. CRAMTON. No. I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by inserting the word "Osage" before the word "Indian," and in connection with that now I ask unanimous consent that as these gentlemen desire it to strike out the word "degree" also.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON to the committee amendment: Page 3, line 25, strike out the words "allottee or" and insert in lieu thereof "original allottees of one-half or more of Osage Indian blood, and."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan that he so modify his amendment?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, at this point I ask unanimous consent that wherever the word "degree" appears in the bill in connection with "one-half degree of Osage Indian blood," it be stricken from the bill.

Mr. LEAVITT. There is no objection to it. It is intended merely to clarify the meaning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to make corrections in the bill by eliminating the word "degree" wherever it appears. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I have offered an amendment at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the committee amendment: On page 3, in line 24, after the word "allotments," insert "of Osage Indians not having a certificate of competency."

Mr. HASTINGS. Just one minute. That amendment makes the exemption of the homestead allotment apply to homesteads of Indians not having a certificate of competency. If the Indian is turned loose from Government supervision, this will permit his homestead to be taxed. I feel that the unrestricted Indians ought to be taxed and bear their tax burdens the same as others.

Mr. ARENTZ. Before the Committee on Indian Affairs the gentlemen from Oklahoma, Mr. CARTWRIGHT and Mr. HOWARD, and yourself, I believe——

Mr. HASTINGS. No; I did not.

Mr. ARENTZ. Well, those two other gentlemen discussed this matter in regard to the homestead and they brought out this statement, that out of the gross receipts from leases of oil and gas and coal and minerals 3 per cent was paid to the State and 2 per cent——

Mr. HASTINGS. One per cent.

Mr. ARENTZ. One per cent to the State and two to the county, whatever that may be. At any rate the entire land that has been leased goes into either the county or the State treasury, and regardless of whether there are a half dozen 160-acre homesteads or all this amount being paid is sufficient to meet more than the cost of taxes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I understand what the gentleman is getting at.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will yield for a correction, the gentleman stated Mr. HOWARD and Mr. CARTWRIGHT, of the committee, made that statement. It was Superintendent Wright who made the argument relative to the payment by the Osage Indians of the 1 per cent on gross production.

Mr. ARENTZ. I stand corrected.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma state his amendment again?

Mr. HASTINGS. It makes the exemption from taxation apply to homesteads of those not having a certificate of competency.

Mr. LEAVITT. Where does it come?

Mr. HASTINGS. After the word "allotments," page 3, line 24. "Homestead allotments shall remain exempt." It applies to Indians not having certificates of competency. In other words, if they are restricted, their homesteads are exempt. If they are under Government supervision, their homesteads are exempt. However, whenever they are turned loose and not under Government supervision, they pay their taxes like anybody else. In answer to what the gentleman from Nevada said in 1921, we added 1 additional per cent tax to the gross production tax on oil; and, if you will examine the argument then made, it was that the 1 per cent should not go into the general fund but to build roads and bridges in Osage County for the benefit of the Osage lands that added value to those lands. It does not go into the general fund of the State at all—this extra 1 per cent.

I can not for the life of me find any reason why, after the Indians are turned loose, whatever their degree of blood, their lands ought not to be taxed.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is a difficult thing to come to a positive conviction upon this matter. I understand that these Indians, when they are given a certificate of competency, are not entirely turned loose. They can not sell their homesteads. They can not sell their land. An Indian may be a full blood, but a certificate of competency does not allow him to sell the land. Under your amendment the land can be taxed.

Mr. HASTINGS. And if your amendment prevails the land can be taxed.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am more concerned about the full bloods.

Mr. HASTINGS. If he is a full blood and after examination is turned loose as competent to manage his own affairs, I think such a man ought to bear his part in the burdens of government, whether in the county or in the State.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Certainly.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma know what percentage of competents turned loose later become indigent?

Mr. HASTINGS. I think comparatively few. I do not have the exact figures.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. I mean the percentage.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Osages who have a homestead have their head rights and can not become indigent.

Mr. FREAR. By this right, as I understand, they have no right to sell or dispose of the land, and yet the land is sold by the State for taxes. What becomes of the Indian's rights?

Mr. HASTINGS. The Osage whose restrictions are entirely removed can sell the surface but not the mineral rights underneath. That is all that is taxed—the surface. The amendment of the gentleman from Michigan would tax all those of one-half Indian blood. This amendment would tax only those that are free of governmental supervision.

Mr. FREAR. But the oil rights remain with the tribe?

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I think there is a misunderstanding of the meaning of that section that is referred to. It provides for that class of Indians who are not on the roll of the tribe. Let us understand that clearly. The Indians capable of inheriting these formally allotted and exempt homesteads are Indians who were not enrolled as Osages. The section provides that the lands of these owners of 160 acres shall remain untaxable as long as the title remains in the original allottees, as long as the heirs or devisees are of one-half or more Indian blood, and provides that they shall not have more than two nontaxable homesteads. It provides for heirs of half or more than one-half blood, and yet their ancestors, especially one ancestor, may have less than half blood or be white.

Now, this provision of the bill was carefully thought out, and it endeavors to provide that the half blood who was not on the roll shall secure a nontaxable homestead and be in the same relationship to the tribe as the half or full blood enrolled and allotted Indian.

Mr. HASTINGS. It says clearly that the homestead allotment shall remain exempt from taxation while the title remains in the original allottee. It can not be heirs.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. It says "or his."

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman said it did not apply to the allottee.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. That is unallotted heirs or devisees of one-half blood, and it does not matter whether they are restricted or not. The fact that an Indian was half or full blood, who may have been made competent and his restrictions removed, does not change the fact that his 160 acres remain nontaxable, and the purpose and idea has been to provide a homestead nontaxable by descent and distribution to Indians of half or more Indian blood. I think these provisions are clearly set forth.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent that the debate on the pending paragraph close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. McKEOWN. I would like to have some time.

Mr. LEAVITT. I will give the gentleman four minutes of that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, under the laws of Oklahoma the State will receive 3 per cent on the oil and gas when they are developed. They are not taxable and can not be taxed, because it has been held in our courts that the interest is not subject to tax until developed. The amendment now, as I understand, is to exempt the homesteads. I do not know how fertile the homesteads are, but if the gentleman modified his amendment so as to make it 80 acres he would always have a home and could not get away with it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. My amendment is to require those who are free of governmental supervision and who are turned loose to be taxed; and it will permit those of one-half or more Indian blood to whom certificates of competency have been issued to have their lands taxed.

Mr. McKEOWN. The Indian, no matter whether he has a certificate of competency or not, is not a fellow who is going to work and make money and pay his taxes. Give him 80 acres for a home. I think 160 acres is too much.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman will admit that the provision before us has nothing to do with creating homesteads or changing homestead rights. The Indian will not have the right to sell it. He will still be restricted as to sale of the 160 acres.

The only question is as to whether or not it shall be taxed. Of course, if taxed the land can not be seized for the payment of taxes, the collection of taxes being enforced through their funds from oil.

Mr. McKEOWN. If you are going to do that, it will be all right, but how can you tax land that you can not sell if a man refuses to pay the taxes? I can not comprehend that.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The Indian is not taxed now, is he?

Mr. McKEOWN. No.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Why tax him at all?

Mr. McKEOWN. He ought to bear his just proportion when he has all the rights and privileges of a white man.

Mr. ABERNETHY. As we have taken pretty much all he has, does not the gentleman think he should have some free taxes?

Mr. McKEOWN. No. He is as competent as you or I, and he should bear his just proportion of taxation.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think I ought to impress upon the gentleman from North Carolina that this amendment only taxes the land of competent Indians that are turned over under no governmental supervision and it exempts from taxation those that are still restricted and under the supervision of the Government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this amendment. The committee gave a great deal of consideration to the working out of a compromise of this matter that would be fair to all concerned and the committee determined that it would be well to exempt from taxation, as well as alienation, the homesteads of these Indians so long as they were in the hands of Indians of full blood or more than half blood. It was determined that that arbitrary line ought to be drawn, and for that reason the committee took the position it did take. That position is upheld by a resolution of the board of county commissioners of Osage County, Okla., in effect, when they stated, under date of March 6, 1928, that they approved such exemption of homesteads from taxation—so long as the Osage Tribe of Indians are required to pay to the county 1 per cent of the amount of gross production on the royalties from oil and gas for the construction and maintenance of roads and bridges in said county.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HASTINGS) there were—ayes 15, noes 27.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HASTINGS to the committee amendment: On page 3, at the end of line 23, strike out the period and add: "but all such leases shall continue as long as gas, oil, or other minerals are found in paying quantities."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, that is practically the language of the act of March 3, 1921, and it makes clear that these oil leases are continued in force as long as oil and gas are found in paying quantities. This makes it clear that oil and gas and other mineral leases are continued as long as oil and gas or other minerals are found in paying quantities.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to be added at the end of section 1, line 5, on page 4. Before the amendment is read I would like to make this explanation. All that this proposed amendment does is to transfer from other parts of the bill to section 1 provisions that are germane to section 1. Really this is based on suggestions made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] and agreed to by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON to the committee amendment: On page 4, in line 5, after the word "acres," insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That restrictions concerning lands and funds of allotted Osage Indians, as provided in this act and all prior acts now in force, shall apply to unallotted Osage Indians of one-half or more Osage Indian blood born since July 1, 1907, or after the passage of this act, and to their heirs of one-half or more Osage Indian blood: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized in his discretion to grant a certificate of competency to any unallotted Osage Indian when in the judgment of the said Secretary such member is fully competent and capable of transacting his or her own affairs: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to interfere in any way with the removal by the Secretary of the Interior of restrictions from and against any Osage Indian allotted or unallotted at any time."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I will simply say that the first proviso is found at the bottom of page 9, lines 23 to 25, and at the top of page 10, down to the words "Indian blood." The second one is found on page 10, lines 14 to 19. The next one is found on page 8, lines 4 to 7, except in that proviso are inserted the words "allotted or unallotted" after the words "any Osage Indian."

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, this is a very unusual character of amendment—an amendment that provides that certain provisions in the various sections of the bill following the first one, which pertain to the same subjects involved in the first one, shall be considered a part of it.

Why, the purpose is to emasculate the bill, to make it so that the bill can be emasculated of every part that the mover of the amendment wishes stricken from it. It seems to me it is out of the ordinary in the consideration of bills. I never heard of it before. Of course, that is not important, perhaps, but it does seem to me that the provisions in the various following sections that have to do with Osage Indian affairs ought to be considered all the while in their sequential order when we get to them, together with other matter in the section.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to ask the gentleman if this is done for the Osage Indians, what assurance have the rest of the congressional districts where there are Indians of wealth that this will not be done to them just as soon as the chance comes?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I refer, of course, to Indians who are the owners of great timber tracts who have potential wealth, but not wealth yet in hand.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Allow me to suggest this——

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. In just a moment. This particular bill, Members of the House, has received most serious and careful consideration before the subcommittee and the entire committee at various times when the representatives of the Osage Indian Council were present, furnishing their judgment and advice, and the bill has been generally agreed upon.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think if the gentleman will yield it will save some time.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman.
